. . . THE COMMANDING GENERAL desires to take this opportunity to extend to the officers and men of the Division a "well done" for its part in the prosecution of the war. . . In the Iwo Jima operation, and in the occupation of the Japanese homeland, the 5th Marine Division, by its execution of assigned missions, exhibited beyond any doubt that its success was derived from a well trained, and well led professional team. The officers and men . . . may take pride in the knowledge that they have played an important role in ultimately defeating the enemy . . . in keeping with the highest tradition of the U. S. Marine Corps. . .

LIEUTENANT GENERAL ROY S. GEIGER
COMMANDING GENERAL, FMFPAC

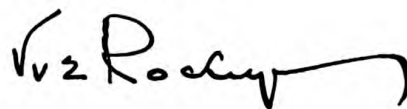

ALL LIVING MARINES of the 5th Marine Division share a high sense of pride in what their Division did in Pacific battle. All share it—those who helped build the 5th but did not fight with it, those who joined it as its own D-day neared, and those who served more briefly after its battles were done. And all of the 5th who live remember the fighting spirit of those who died.

The 5th Marine Division was granted the boon of adequate time for combat training. It was able to train into an efficient battle team at places where every aid to that grim growth of power could be made available. From its earliest days to the hour of its disbandment, I found the 5th to possess and maintain a high standard of military performance and an esprit exceptionally fine.

And when the 5th Division entered combat, it acted from the first hour like a unit of veterans. It fought that first tough fight with the utmost vigor, courage, and intelligence. Few times in history has a force kept fighting in the face of losses such as our Division suffered on Iwo Jima. The Division followed attack with attack. It continued to assault the heavy resistance of a desperate enemy—until the last small pocket on the island was overcome.

As a single member of the 5th Marine Division who was given the great privilege of leading it in training and battle, I here join with all other veterans of the 5th in tribute to The Spearhead.

Forging the Spearhead

THE 5TH MARINE DIVISION was activated on Armistice Day of 1943 in compliance with orders dated November 11 from Marine Corps Headquarters in Washington to the Fleet Marine Force, San Diego, California, and Camp Lejeune, North Carolina.

By that day of that year nearly four hundred thousand men of the United States Marine Corps were driving steadily forward in the great amphibious struggle to reach the Japanese homeland. The 1st Marine Division was almost ready, in its advance staging areas on Goodenough Island and New Guinea, to begin the Cape Gloucester campaign. The 2nd Division was on its way to Tarawa. The 3d was fighting through the jungle swamps of Bougainville. And the 4th, still in the United States, would soon leave there for the Marshall Islands and the Roi-Namur assault.

But four Marine divisions were not enough in a war whose end was not then in sight, and so the 5th Marine Division came into being on November 11, 1943.

On December 1, the Division Headquarters Battalion officially began operating at Camp Pendleton, California. In ten more days the 26th and 27th Marines (infantry) and the 13th Marines (artillery) were organized.

Trainload after trainload of men and materials of combat for the 5th Division came down the winding spur of the Santa Fe into Camp Pendleton. Trucks and buses rolled up Highway 101 from San Diego with similar loads. From the boot camps at Parris Island and San Diego, from the training centers of Camps Elliott and Lejeune and Pendleton itself; from the schools at the Quantico barracks and ship detachments of the fleet—from every available source, men and officers streamed into the Division.

Finally, many hundreds of veterans of earlier Marine campaigns arrived for duty with the Division, some on transports from the Pacific combat areas, others from hospitals and from sick leave. These officers and men brought with them combat experience and practical knowledge of the jungle and the Jap, which would add immeasurably to training realism and efficiency.

The official activation date was January 21, 1944. For two weeks after this Brigadier General Thomas A. Bourke was the acting Division Commander. Then on February 4, Major General Keller E. Rockey came from his former post as Assistant Commandant of the Marine Corps to assume command. General Bourke then became the assistant Division Commander of the 5th, and Colonel William A. Worton its Chief of Staff.

By February 8 the Division Commander had placed a training schedule in the hands of his regimental and battalion commanders, directing every unit of the Division to complete its activation and then to begin training at once. It directed that squad, platoon, company, battalion and regimental training would follow in regular succession. The final preparation for island campaign and battle would consist of amphibious assault exercises. By the time this "start work" order was in effect, other Division components—engineer, artillery and medical units formed at Camp Lejeune—had reached the West Coast and joined the 5th.

The rest of the main combat units of the 5th were activated on February 8—the 28th Marines and Division service troops. The 28th completed the Division's complement of infantry. Into it went most of the Marines of the 1st Parachute Regiment, which had seen action in the Solomons and had later been ordered back to the States for conversion into division troops. The 28th, under Colonel Harry B. Liversedge, soon moved to Tent Camp No. 1 in Las Pulgas Canyon for lack of space in the Pendleton barracks areas.

The Division began its training quickly and efficiently, which surprised no one. For the 5th, in contrast to the four Marine divisions which had preceded it, was beginning from scratch according to a detailed activation plan worked out months before the official orders were out. The Division had been built from the top down. From the moment he learned that the new command was his, General Rockey began informally to pick his key men.

He was helped in this early stage by a number of able planners. Colonel Worton, who would become the Division's chief of staff, recommended certain outstanding instructors and students to be drawn from the Marine Corps Schools. Colonel Ray A. Robinson, then in charge of operations and training for the Marine Corps; Colonel Benjamin W. Gally, chief of the detail branch at Marine Corps Headquarters which controlled all personnel assignments; his assistant, Lieutenant Colonel Thomas A. Wornham, who handled enlisted assignments; and Colonel John Beckett, who later became G-1 of the 5th—all worked with General Rockey to help him pick at an early date the regimental commanders of the Division soon to be formed, and the key members of its general and special staffs.

These officers then began to line up their own subordinates. The Commandant of the Marine Corps released a number of officers, previously frozen in their staff jobs, for duty with the new Division. Capable young officers and NCOs available for later assignment to the 5th were ordered to specialist schools. When they joined the Division later they brought with them a thorough knowledge of the latest training ideas at Marine Corps schools, and the knowledge that enabled them to get their units working without a great deal of wasted effort. The same thing may be said of the graduates from the enlisted schools who filled key positions in the Division.

► THE 5th's FIRST HOME

CAMP JOSEPH H. PENDLETON, the first home of the 5th Marine Division, was named for the late Major General "Uncle Joe" Pendleton, who had been the father of Marine Corps activities on the West Coast. It was ideal for combat training, for it had rolling hills, higher mountains, broad valleys, steep-sided canyons, and wooded areas with swampy stream beds with undergrowth as thick as any jungle. The area extended to the California coast where canyons notched the high cliffs above the beaches that stretched for eighteen miles from Oceanside north to San Onofre.

The main camp lay within a saucer-shaped plateau some ten miles in from the ocean. It was divided into self-contained areas, each with its barracks, administration buildings, storerooms, sick bay, theater, post exchange, and athletic facilities. Spreading out to the north were the tent camps, equipped as billets for regiments and battalions, and units of similar strength. Beside Lake O'Neil stood the U.S. Naval Hospital, Santa Margarita Ranch. In area and in population, Camp Pendleton was the largest of all Marine Corps training centers.

► THE SPEARHEAD DIVISION

AS TRAINING went on and the Division became more and more closely knit, a contest was held to decide on its shoulder insignia. The 5th had adopted "Spearhead" as its nickname, in view of its probable role in future battles, and the insignia that was chosen from 588 entries was symbolic of the name. The winning design, submitted by Lt. Fergus Young, was a scarlet shield and gold V, pierced by a spearhead of blue.

Inevitably, motor vehicles, tanks, even artillery pieces, were named with appropriate ceremony. Most jeeps were named for wives and sweethearts. One private changed the name of his jeep from Frances to Ella Mae, and when asked why said, "Frances got married." But there was a wide variety of other nicknames. Communications jeeps and trucks showed up with such names as Short Circuit, Send-by-Wire, and Wig Wag. Some outfits named their transportation for famous Marine Corps battles. It took two lines for one Marine to put a name on his jeep. It was Huma-huma-nuka-nuka-a-pu-aa—which is a tiny Hawaiian fish. But the best known jeep at Camp Pendleton was named O'Malley—for Gen. Rockey's favorite comic character.

As the Division grew, Marine Corps Headquarters set up a $25,000 Division recreation fund. This money, with added profits from the post exchange, went for athletic equipment, dances, moving pictures, stage shows, the library, musical instruments, equipment for chaplains, and thousands of other items from acey-deucey to radios.

The American Red Cross unit assigned to the 5th was under Field Director Bruce Thomas. The unit made furlough loans to Marines, sponsored dances, established and equipped fifteen recreation rooms throughout the camp, and issued comfort supplies for overseas and combat use.

From every post and station in the States and from Pacific battle fronts Leathernecks assigned to the 5th Division arrive at Camp Pendleton.

► SNAPPING IN

THE MASTER TRAINING SCHEDULE prescribed the first serious training of the 5th—to familiarize the individual Marine with his tools of war. Soon the crack of rifles, carbines, pistols, BARs and machine guns, and the thumping impact of exploding mortar shells could be heard echoing from every part of the Pendleton reservation. Heavier pieces—the 37s, 75s and 105s of weapons companies and tank and artillery units—furnished a deeper, heavier chorus to the sharper noises of the lighter weapons.

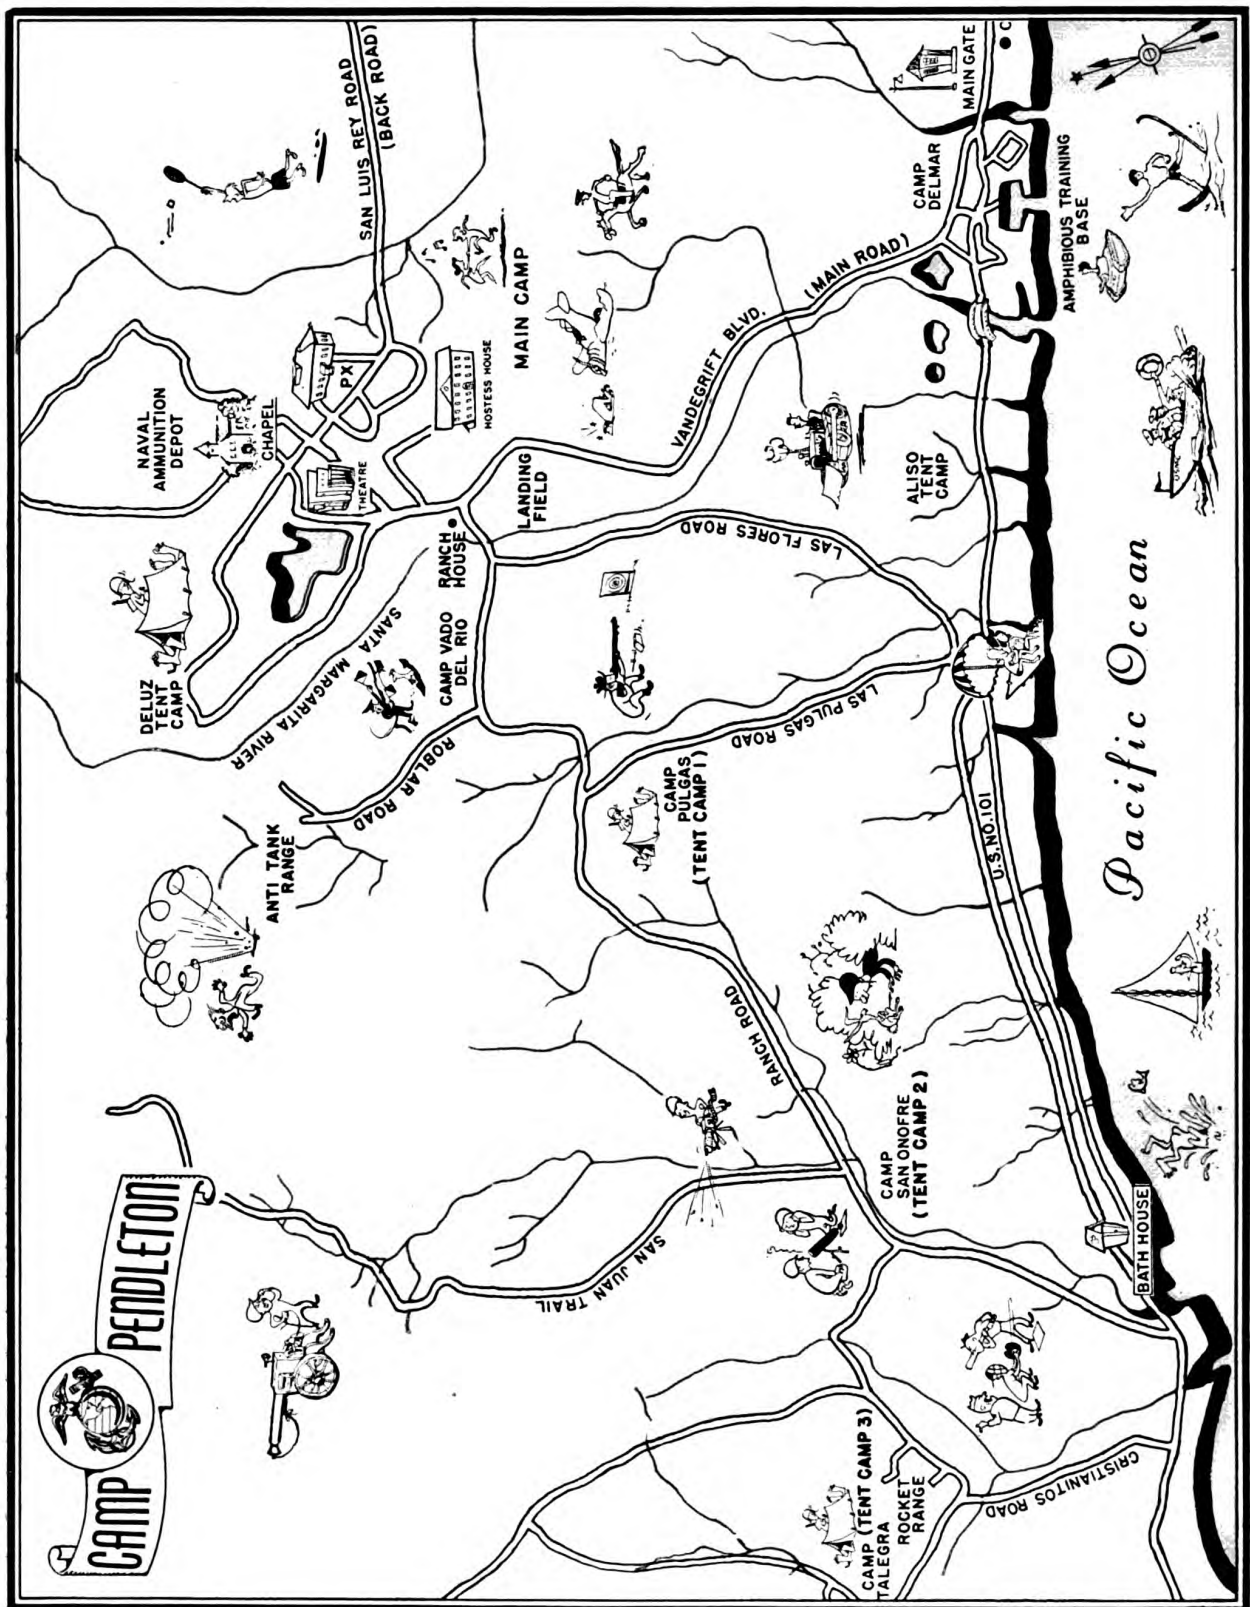

Once they had gained some knowledge of their own weapons, infantrymen began to operate in fire teams, and drill in the assault tactics of squads and platoons. In April, company commanders took their units into the field for unit training, which included six hours a week of night work, firing problems with live ammunition, stiff tactical marches, and three-day bivouacs.

Most realistic of all the training was the infiltration course. Night after night, as machine-gun bullets cracked inches over their heads, the Leathernecks bellied across the course. It was a crawl of a hundred yards over an area filled with explosive charges and criss-crossed with barbed wire. It was an experience as close to that of combat as possible, and its completion gave a man a certain amount of confidence in his ability to move under fire. No one doubted the great value of this particular training. The close whine of the live ammunition, the shock of detonation of the buried explosive charges, and the flying debris these charges rained upon the advancing Marines left no doubt in their minds that war was a business in which a man could get hurt. And it showed every man clearly that thorough training for what might come in war could indeed mean the eventual difference between life and death in battle.

All other units in the Division had begun training in their special fields—engineer and pioneer units, motor transport, medical, tank, signal, and service units, all were hard at work. The 13th Marines, under Colonel James D. Waller, worked out extensive field exercises on the artillery ranges of Pendleton, then moved to Camp Dunlap at Niland, California, for a week there of advanced training in massing of fire. In an organizational change, the 16th Marines was split on May 25 into the 5th Engineer Battalion and the 5th Pioneer Battalion. The two battalions went through extensive courses in demolitions, map- and model-making, bridging and crossing streams, waterproofing of vehicles, the use of land mines and camouflage, shore-party operations and other special engineer-pioneer training.

The Motor Transport Battalion, although it had to be used to some extent for current Division hauling, was still able to devote much of its time to a stiff training schedule that included road and cross-country driving—day and night, alone and in convoy—and maintenance under all sorts of ground and weather conditions.

Lieutenant Colonel William R. Collins' 5th Tank Battalion, once it had built and improved its tent camp out near the coast, took its thirty-eight training tanks through firing and tactical exercises in varied simulations of combat. Men came to this unit direct from the tank school at the training center of Camp Elliott.

No division can operate without its communications. The Division Signal Company and the communications sections of all the regiments and battalions gradually became expert at handling all types of communications facilities. They fed out networks of wire until at times it seemed that a telephone hung from every tree on the Pendleton reservation. Radio men sent and received dummy radio messages on all sorts of radios, from big vehicle-mounted sets to "walkie-talkies." Many of the radio men had been "ham" or experienced commercial operators before the war and were equally at home in code or voice transmission. Every message center kept up its flow of practice traffic, and also handled the administrative messages needed from unit to unit in the daily training operations.

The Division military police also got on-the-job as well as special training. They controlled the heavy traffic of the camp area and enforced camp and unit regulations; they aided the civilian police of Oceanside and San Clemente, and went through special courses in their combat duties. The Division Reconnaissance Company spent much time in the field on practice scouting and intelligence missions in nearby Cleveland National Forest and later at Santa Catalina Island, where it learned to make its way in and out of the surf of the ocean beaches in its rubber boats and other special reconnaissance equipment.

Continuous training was also going on in every executive and special staff echelon. Clerks, bandsmen, ordnance men, supply men, and all the other headquarters specialists kept pace with the general preparation for entry into combat.

By early summer every infantryman of the 5th Marine Division, well aware that he would have a front-line job in combat, realized too that he would have powerful support from every other unit in the Division.

This first became evident in the battalion and regimental training phases, when commanders began integrating supporting weapons—mortars, machine guns, 37mm guns, 75mm halftracks—into unit maneuvers.

The peak of Division practice in coordination came when the 13th Marines and the Division service troops were split up for attachment to the three regiments in order to form combat and landing teams. Attached, then, to each infantry regiment were the following: a battalion of artillery; a company each of engineers, pioneers, tanks, and medical and motor transport troops; one platoon each from the Military Police, Ordnance and Service and Supply Companies, and one band section from Headquarters Company. The Reconnaissance Company remained under Division Headquarters control, but furnished men to the different regiments in field training that required their use. All men and units of these teams were being welded into streamlined combat organizations and soon a high morale was fused with full fighting skill.

General conditioning of the men came in for constant attention. This included a program specifically designed to bring every Marine to the height of physical fitness—regular periods of calisthenics, a combat conditioning course made up of one difficult obstacle after another, and periods of learning how to abandon ship and keep afloat in the water. Those who could not swim were taught to.

Despite the heavy physical training schedule, the Marines had energy left for several kinds of off-duty sports. Baseball and softball diamonds were full of activity whenever the weather permitted, and basketball, too, was popular, even when it took the simple form of practice throwing into netted hoops nailed to barracks walls.

While infantry companies launched their training, specialists like artillerymen tested new equipment in the field.

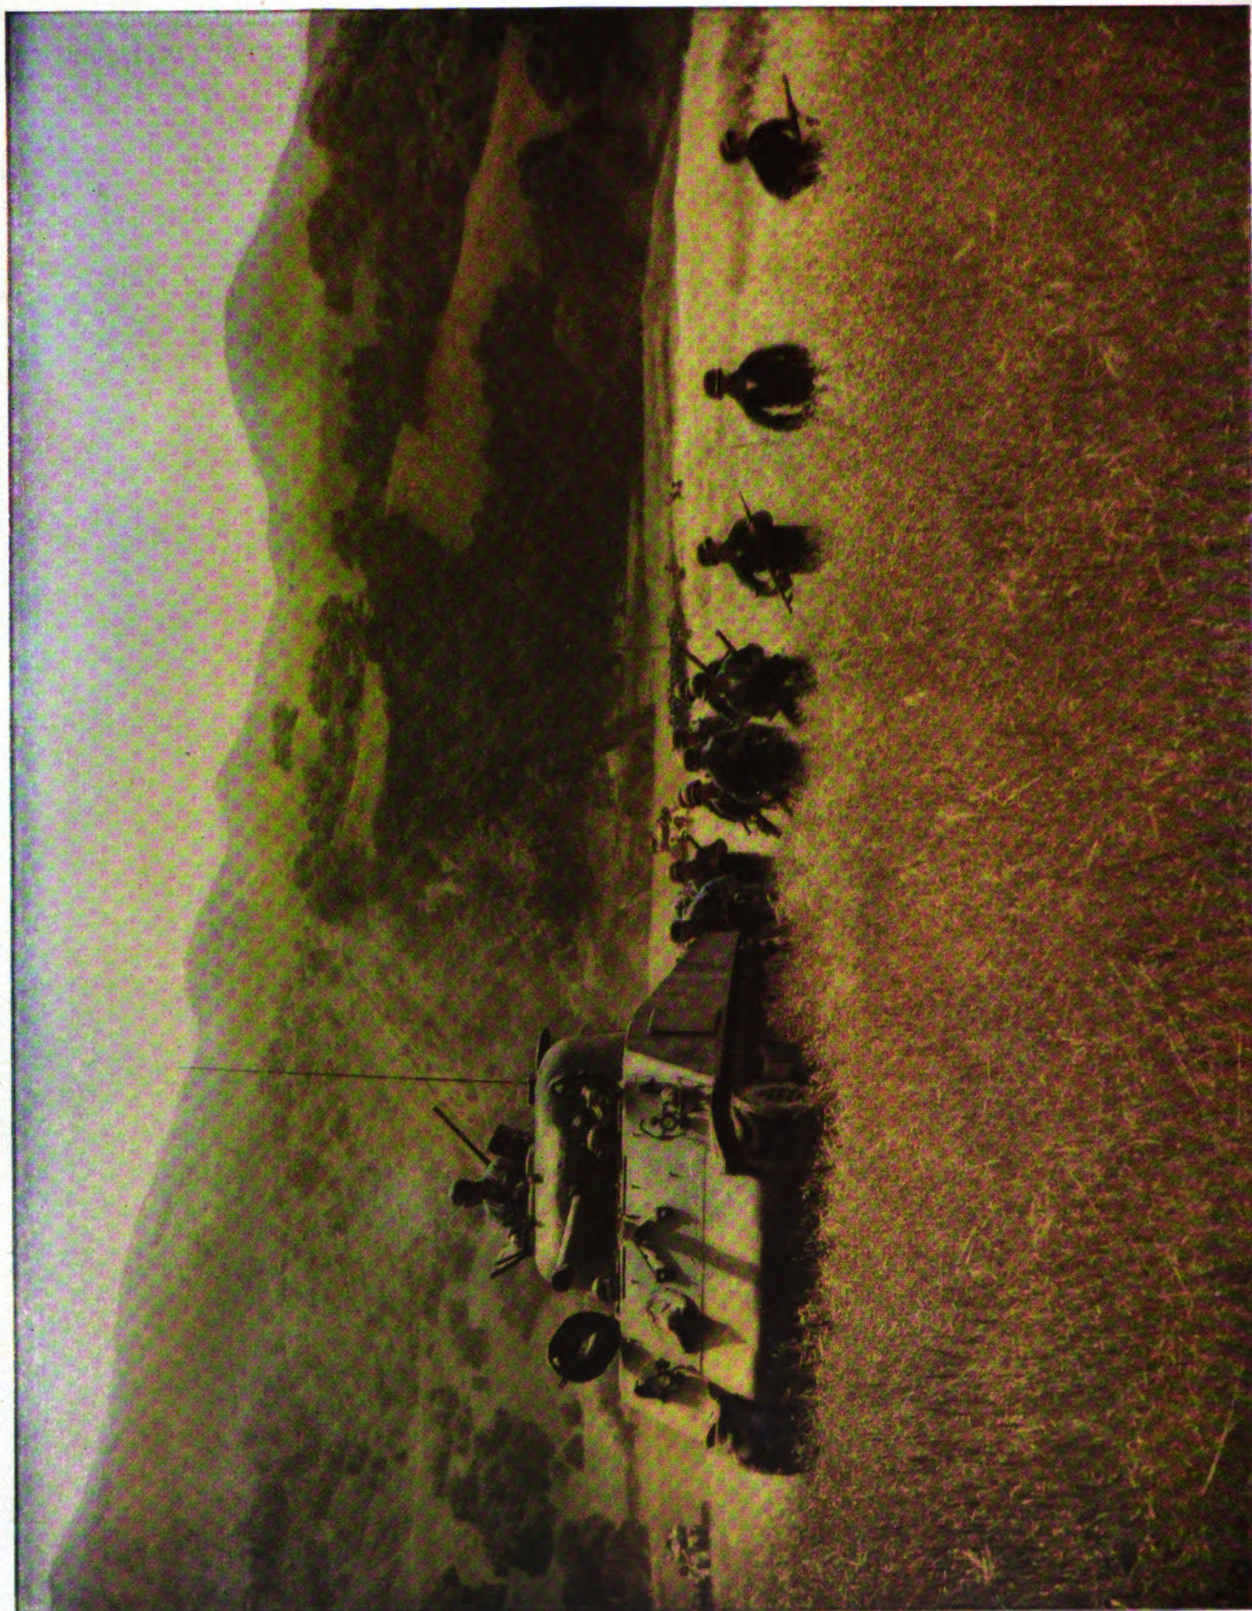

The latter phases of combat training were particularly kept under close observation by the higher command. By now, Brigadier General Leo D. (Dutch) Hermle, former ADC and Chief of Staff of the 2nd Marine Division, had replaced General Bourke as the Assistant Division Commander. General Hermle was a constant observer and supervisor of every stage of training.

High-ranking visitors from the armies of the United Nations also came to watch the Division train. Among them were members of the British and Canadian armies and navies, the Royal Marines, officers from Australian and New Zealand units, and members of the French Military Mission and the Royal Netherlands Marines.

During this same period—April and May—the regiments received their official colors. As for all Marine Corps units, the colors consisted of the Stars and Stripes of the United States on one pike and the scarlet and gold of the United States Marine Corps on another. As these new flags were unfurled in proper ceremony, every man in the 5th knew that his Division had come of age.

► AMPHIBIOUS TRAINING

THE DIVISION now entered its advanced training phase. The Troop Training Unit, an amphibious training element of the Pacific Fleet, which was commanded by a Marine major general, brought its staff to Camp Pendleton to help the 5th train its men in amphibious warfare. Staff schools were set up to give special training in the following aspects of Marine landings: transport quartermaster, medical, naval gunfire, shore party, communication and waterproofing.

First step in individual training was extensive practice in climbing up and down net-covered mock-ups, both at Camp Pendleton and at the Naval Boat Basin, and the men soon became expert at getting themselves and their equipment over the side of a ship. Troop Training Unit instructors also taught boat technique, naval terminology and individual landings. Soon the Division's nine landing teams—the nine infantry battalions and supporting elements—were ready to practice amphibious assaults as units.

Lieutenant Colonel Chester B. Graham's CT 26 entered this final stage of training first. Early in July CT

26 embarked upon transports at San Diego, California. Twice its landing units delivered an assault through the surf against barren San Clemente Island, sixty-odd miles off the coast of California. Then they reembarked and turned toward the mainland for a third assault on "Pendleton Island."

In the orders for this operation, "Pendleton Island" was described as a strongly-held advance airbase of the Japanese in the Western Pacific—a base that menaced the advance of U.S. forces. The Division's first objective was a symbol of the objective it would finally seize.

three transports and one cargo ship. On shore, Marines from the other regiments defended landing areas at Aliso and Las Pulgas beaches. As the troops drove ashore, explosives placed on the beach rocketed sand and mud into the air in simulation of mines and gunfire. The defending forces used blank ammunition in their pieces and fireworks showered down on the attackers to add some combat realism. As the assault reached the barbed-wire obstacles along the beaches and gained a foothold there, the defending forces fell back to prepared delaying positions. Umpires and Division Headquarters itself, from its command post in the area, controlled the advance of the assaulting teams and the resistance of the defenders.

As General Rockey watched his Marine combat teams leave their landing craft, reorganize on the beaches and begin their push inland, he knew that the six hard months of work and training had brought the results he hoped for. The Spearhead Division was well trained, would soon be ready for battle. Near General Rockey, another pleased observer saw the landings from a big black car—the Commander in Chief of all United States forces, President Franklin D. Roosevelt.

► BOUND OVERSEAS

THE FIRST WARNING of combat itself came on July 12 when maneuvers planned for CT 26 were cancelled, and the unit returned to camp and prepared to move overseas. This did not, however, affect the rest of the Division. The assault on Guam had been scheduled for August, and one combat team from the 5th Division was ordered into floating reserve for the 1st Provisional Marine Brigade of III Amphibious Corps. The rest of the 5th continued its training and maneuvers. CT 27 and CT 28 in their turn "took" San Clemente Island, and then delivered three-day-long assaults on "Pendleton Island."

By now the Division had reached a state of high esprit, for there was no question that it would get into the Pacific fighting. The Division Public Information Section recorded the activities of the men and units during this period, and with the help of the Division Photographic Section, published them in pictorial form as Volume I of the Spearhead, the Division magazine.

With the sailing of the 26th Marines from San Diego on July 22, every man realized how short a time apparently remained before the 5th would throw its force against the Japanese—alongside the four earlier Marine divisions and the other units of Fleet Marine Force, Pacific, under Lieutenant General Holland M. Smith.

On July 11, 1944, President Franklin D. Roosevelt witnessed the landings at Aliso Beach. He is talking to naval officers and his son, James, a Marine colonel. In the foreground General Rockey with his aide, Lt. Howard Morris.

As the Marianas campaign progressed favorably, CT 26 was relieved from floating reserve and ordered to the island of Hawaii. About that time top-secret orders arrived to move the rest of the Division to the same place, although it had not yet been assigned a mission. Early in August, CT 27, under Colonel Wornham, packed, crated and marked its equipment for movement overseas. General Rockey and his Division headquarters sailed on August 12 with the reinforced 27th. The Division was off to war, but months more would pass before it made an opposed landing.

Making "goodbye" count. These 5th Division men leave Los Angeles to return to their alerted units at Pendleton.

To Camp Tarawa

BUSTLING, SAILOR-PACKED San Diego, thirty-five miles below Camp Pendleton, had offered little competition to Los Angeles and Hollywood as a liberty town. But many a "short short-timer" was willing to reconsider as trucks and buses carried the Division down the city's camouflaged streets past the huge aircraft factories, the familiar drive-ins, bowling alleys and cocktail lounges, and the green fence of the San Diego Padres' ball park. These were all State-side things and seemed particularly important now.

Then the trucks turned into the waterfront area—a world of gray-nosed ships, clamor of winches, shouts of longshoremen, piles of stacked equipment, and long lines of helmeted Marines. As the lines moved up each gangway into their transports, officers checked off names on embarkation rosters. Inside the ships men scrambled down ladders to the water line and into damp and dimly lighted compartments. There they heaped their packs and equipment on the sheets of laced canvas that formed the five-tiered bunks. Air swished from ventilators into the holds but made them hardly less stifling.

Loudspeakers called out guard watches and ordered cooks and messmen to "lay below" to the galley. And soon followed the inevitable "Sweepers, man your brooms . . ."

► FIRST VOYAGE

AT DUSK the ships cast off their moorings and one by one slid out into San Diego Harbor. There they turned west to form convoy lines and nosed down the channel past North Island and Point Loma. The lights of San Diego slowly faded behind them, and as the ground swells grew some faces paled, and noise and laughter seemed to die away as the ships put out to sea.

On every ship of the convoy "scuttlebutt hounds" worked overtime at passing rumors around:

"We're not really going overseas, we're heading toward San Francisco."

"We're going to hit the Kurile Islands, north of Japan."

"We're going straight to Tokyo."

But the best rumor was that there were several women aboard. Like the rest, it was just a rumor.

On the second day at sea this pastime ended abruptly when unit commanders announced the destination—Hawaii.

By the second day, too, every dog smuggled aboard ship had been freed from its hiding place—from boxes marked "signal equipment," extra sea bags, and other ingenious containers. These animals scampered around under foot while their masters were busy figuring angles to get them ashore without having them quarantined.

Three days out of San Diego the weather turned tropical, and men spent most of their time above decks, reading whodunits and Westerns (courtesy of Special Services and the Red Cross), watching the flying fish, or just staring off into space. Although there is no mention of this in the official records, it is suspected that there may also have been games of chance going on.

Marines also spent hours in the long lines that extended down the passageways and the weather decks—to the galley, the sick bay, the soda fountain, the library and the heads. At scheduled times units assembled for calisthenics, inspections and ships' drills, and for censorship and intelligence briefings. There was a great deal of letter-writing going on, and all this mail had to be censored in accordance with regulations.

This naturally had its effect on what the men wrote. All hands were told that once they were ashore they could say they were "on an island somewhere in the "So long, Stateside." The Hawaii-bound 5th Division takes a last look at San Diego.

Pacific," but they must not indicate in any way that they were in the Hawaiian Islands. In spite of this, censors on every ship worked with razor blades to slice forbidden words and phrases out of letters written by some of the rugged individualists—such words as "pineapple," "high mountain," and "sugar cane." This battle of wits went on for some time, but gradually the security importance of censorship was clearly understood throughout the Division.

At sea. A transport's 20mm guns fire on a radio-controlled plane during target practice.

On many of the ships hatch covers were turned into rings for afternoon boxing matches, but at night there was a strict blackout topside, and then most men stayed below decks in the troop compartments or went to movies in messhalls converted into theaters.

The leading ships of the convoy made their first landfall six days after the submarine nets had closed behind them across the San Diego channel. Hours before the ships rounded the stone breakwater and nosed into Hilo Harbor, Marines could see the towering cones of Mauna Kea and Mauna Loa. And in the clear sunlit air they could see Haleakala—not quite so high as the others but with the largest extinct crater in the world at its summit—forty miles off where it anchored the island of Maui to the sea and reached into the clouds.

But most attention centered on "our" island. This was Hawaii, 140 miles south of Oahu (best known of the islands) and by far the largest of the eight that form the Hawaiian group. Most men of the 5th Division had never seen the "big island." Many, of course, had not been out of the States. Some had been in Honolulu, but most of the men who had been in the Pacific during the war had gotten there by way of the Panama Canal, Samoa, New Zealand and Australia, and were now seeing the Hawaiian Islands for the first time. On the big island, fields of sugar cane rippled from the ocean on up the sides of the twin volcanos whose black fingers of hardened lava extended down between the green spread of cane. Against this background glistened the tin of warehouse roofs and stores.

As the ships neared the Hilo anchorage hundreds of people lined the waterfront under the palms, but strangely, there seemed to be no girls in grass skirts standing among them. As they lined the rails of their transports, the men caught sight, too, of the twisting paved road above the coastal cliffs, the deep gorges spanned by slender bridges of the Hawaiian railroad, and the waterfalls—rainbows arching high above them—that spilled from irrigation flumes. The first overseas home of the Division was a place of beauty.

If the Islands were new to most 5th Division Marines, Leathernecks were no novelty to the people themselves although they had not arrived in strength until 1943. The Army units dispersed throughout the islands to counter the very real threat of invasion in 1941 and 1942 had gradually been concentrated near Kamuela—a village in the great Parker Ranch, the second largest cattle ranch in the world—as the possibility of attack diminished. There they established a camp some sixty-five miles from Hilo in the north central part of Hawaii. It lay 2,600 feet above sea level and approximately twelve miles from the nearest coastline.

Two years after Pearl Harbor, in December 1943, the 2d Marine Division, weary and combat-shattered, had been withdrawn from Tarawa and moved to the big island, there to take the place of the Army units at Parker Ranch. It had given the name of Camp Tarawa to the big tent area. Six months later the rehabilitated 2d had moved to the far Pacific again for the assaults on Saipan and Tinian in the Marianas. Now the 5th would occupy Camp Tarawa.

► OVERSEAS HOME

THE 5TH DIVISION moved by five different routes to the camp. Some truck convoys crawled up the scenic coastal highway, then overland to the ranch country. Some climbed the steady rise of the Army's "Saddle" road, moving high up through the black-gray lava fields of the two great volcanos, going so high that Marines shivered from the cold.

A sizable part of the 5th, however, made the trip on the island railroad, pulled by engines of ancient and curious types, in cars better adapted to sugar cane than passengers. The Marines who rode to camp this way found women and children lining the tracks to give them a fervent welcome, chiefly expressed by tossing tropical fruit into the cars. Certain men, however, felt that the welcome was carried to extremes, among them Sergeant James E. Donner, who took a coconut square in his midriff.

A few units landed from LSMs at Maume Beach, twelve miles from camp, and loaded into trucks for the rest of the trip by road. The fifth route was by air. A few Marine officers landed in planes on Bordelon Field's humped cinder runway.

At Camp Tarawa the men found rows of pyramidal tents, rocking in the wind. These tents were pitched over extremely shaky wooden decks. An occasional administration building of wood and caneboard, and quonset storerooms and galleys broke the monotony of the rows of tents. A thick coating of dust covered tents and buildings and gave them the color of the ground around them. This came from the constant gusts of wind that blew over the camp and snatched dust from the network of dirt and gravel roads.

Camp Tarawa soon lost its dingy look as the Division went to work to spruce it up. However, certain disadvantages continued. Outcrops of lava jutting through the topsoil made the area something of an obstacle course at night, theaters were nothing more than outdoor screens with leaky sandbags piled around them, and showers ran ice cold. Even so, it was not long before the Spearhead Marines figured out that Camp Tarawa made a much better home than most other Leatherneck camps in the Pacific area.

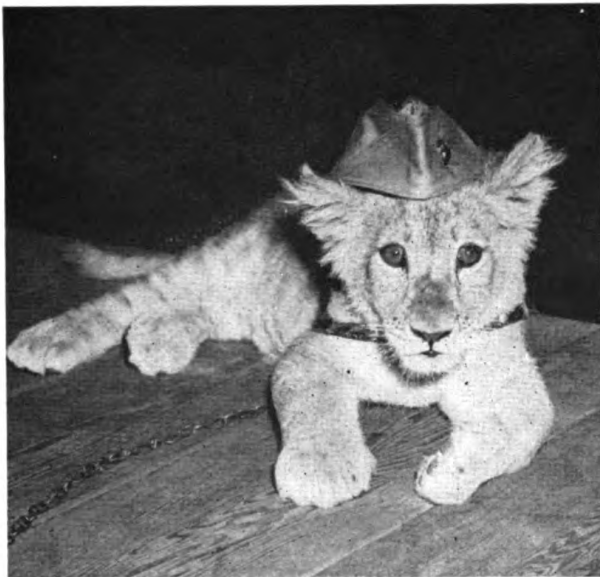

Certainly it was an ideal spot for training. In the huge area around Kamuela there was room enough for Division units to put on simultaneous maneuvers and work out firing problems for all their weapons. The south range area, ten miles square, stretched mauka (toward the mountain) and makai (toward the sea). On this rolling lava-covered ground there was excellent observation for artillery and heavy weapons, and a considerable variation of terrain for maneuver.

The camp area had a "wet side" and a "dry side," for Kamuela, near its center, was on the line that separated the rain-soaked part of Hawaii from the arid central regions. The wet side was an area of mountains and jungle, with mile-high Kohala and the tropical Waipio Valley providing areas entirely different from the more open country only a few miles away—areas especially suitable for "South Pacific" combat training. There was still another type of training area used by the 5th Division—a four-mile strip of beach with a large tent camp, an area set aside for swimming and other recreation.

The owners and manager of the Parker Ranch (the whole area had been leased to the Navy for one dollar a year) helped the 5th in other ways. They made available an athletic field at Kamuela, a deep-sea fishing sampan, and a house for the use of General Rocky's staff headquarters mess.

In August and September the 28th Marines and parts of the 13th Marines arrived from the States, and by mid-October, eleven months after the 5th Division had been activated, its last units left for Hawaii and closed the rear echelon command post at Camp Pendleton. The 28th brought with it to Camp Tarawa its lion mascot, Roscoe, originally a resident of the Los Angeles Zoo. He had thrived on the life in camp as well as any Leatherneck, and after quarantine on Oahu, Roscoe was brought by air to Camp Tarawa.

Some of the last Division troops to reach Tarawa also had to spend a week in quarantine, for Private Buell Pigg had come down with polio during the voyage from the States, but no epidemic developed. In general the new men, like the old, thrived on the combination of warm days and cool nights that characterizes the Hawaiian climate the year around.

Now the 5th Division as a fighting whole could settle down to the final business of battle training.

Training Overseas

THE FIRST POTENTIAL COMBAT ORDERS the Division received directed that it be alerted for Operation STALEMATE, the planned assaults against Yap and Ulithi in the Palaus. Operation STALEMATE was a series of assaults, first on the southernmost islands of the Palau group, then on Yap, some 300 miles to the northeast, and finally on Ulithi, 130 miles beyond Yap in the same direction.

However, changes in the original plans came rapidly. The stiff resistance of the Japanese at Angaur and Peleliu required the use of units already in the combat areas which had originally been designated as assault troops for the Yap phase of STALEMATE, and slowed down the time schedule for its other phases. At this point, the 5th Division was told that it would make the assault on Yap. About the time this word was passed down a reconnaissance party went in from a submarine to scout the reef-fringed beaches of Yap, and never returned. Then came alternate plans to the Yap assault: reinforcement of the assault units on Peleliu; capture of Babelthuap, the main island of the Palau group; the assault on Yap itself and its occupation. The Division G-2 held daily briefings for staff and commanders on the basis of dispatches from the present combat area.

When the resistance on Peleliu finally cracked, it was necessary for CinCPAC (the Commander in Chief of the Pacific) to completely re-evaluate the STALEMATE operation. The final decision was that neither time nor troops were available to complete all its phases and still keep up with the master time-table of the Pacific war. Yap and Babelthuap were therefore by-passed, and Ulithi fell without opposition.

The "alert" status of the 5th Division was promptly cancelled, and the regimental combat teams which had been formed for STALEMATE were disbanded and the units forming them reverted to their parent organizations. At Camp Tarawa General Rockey issued orders, following a directive from Fleet Marine Force, Pacific, for a thorough review of basic, small-unit, landing-team and combat-team training, to last until the end of 1944 and to end with amphibious maneuvers.

Throughout this training period commanders stressed new combat developments from the Saipan, Tinian, Guam and Peleliu operations. Marine infantrymen reviewed every phase of training from that of the individual fighting man to combat team exercises. Camp Tarawa's immense training areas were in constant use as full-dress regimental field problems got under way. Men with rifles, carbines, BARs, bazookas and flame-throwers; mortar and machine-gun crews; and infantry and artillery units with 37s, 75s and 105s—all worked together as the 5th Division gained still further combat proficiency. Different units brushed up on special operations in their fields. The artillery test-fired packages of Japanese-language surrender leaflets. VMO-5 practiced air observation from their OY Cub-type planes. Medical companies, besides their field training, operated sick bays and assisted the staff of the Army's station hospital at Kamuela. Engineers, under Lieutenant Colonel Clifford H. Shuey, brought Camp Tarawa into excellent repair, worked on new construction, and carried on a full training schedule with demolitions, mines and other special equipment.

The Motor Transport Battalion continued its administrative hauling between Camp Tarawa and Hilo. A Seabee unit (the 31st Naval Construction Battalion, commanded by Commander D. T. Ermilio) recently attached to the 5th Division, received some military training along with its construction work. The special companies of Headquarters Battalion—Signal, Reconnaissance, Military Police and Headquarters—all went through vigorous training; and the Service Battalion worked constantly to support the Division with food, ammunition, fuel, clothing, shoe repair, laundry, and other services. Communications specialists perfected their radio, telephone and message center work. Cooks went through a special course on preparing dehydrated foods. And language officers and NCOs taught the men Japanese phrases useful for combat and reviewed the Japanese methods of fighting.

The Pioneer Battalion, under Major Robert S. Riddell, was billeted at Camp POW, on the heights above Hilo, where Japanese aliens had been assembled after war began. This was one of the rainiest spots on Hawaii and Marines of this unit were accustomed to splashing through a couple of inches of water after the daily downpour. But whatever the weather, they provided ship-unloading details and quartermaster working parties, operated heavy equipment and received extensive training in shore-party work and cargo handling.

The next step in training was carried out at Camp Drews, the tent camp by a shallow reef-fringed cove on the northern coast of the island. Units in turn marched the twelve miles down the slopes of Mauna Kea over a road built by the engineer battalions, for combat exercises at the coastal camp. In addition to normal unit training at Camp Drews Division set up a program of swimming instruction under Warrant Officer Melvin K. Archer, former Olympic champion. In the clear, warm water of the lagoon, Archer and his assistants taught non-swimmers the fundamentals of staying afloat and alive in the water.

In the final phases of this training period, combat units rehearsed their battle tactics, with special emphasis on the tactics of assault. Every unit practiced time and again the attack formations which the 5th would use in actual operations, until every Marine knew exactly what his job in battle would be.

During this period many officers and enlisted Marines were promoted to ranks appropriate to their positions, and several high-level personnel changes were made. Colonel Worton, chief of staff of the 5th, who had guided the early planning and organization of the Division, was promoted to brigadier general and ordered to join the 3d Marine Division at Guam. Colonel James F. Shaw, Jr., 5th Division G-3, became acting Chief of Staff until October 10, when Colonel Ray A. Robinson reported from the 3d Division.

► RECREATION

HARD AS THE DIVISION worked getting ready for combat, its men still had many chances for recreation. Marines on liberty learned a great many things about the Hawaiian Islands and their history during visits to Hilo and to many surpassingly beautiful places which thousands of tourists had visited before them. For liberty periods too short for sightseeing there were plenty of places to relax—the Kamuela USO, the officer and NCO clubs, and the camp “slop chutes.” Athletics also took up a large part of off-duty time. Division and regimental baseball teams and literally scores of unit softball teams were organized, and competed in regularly scheduled games. The 5th Division baseball team played against touring teams made up of former major and minor league baseball stars, now in the armed forces. Whenever the sign, “Baseball Today,” was hung up on the Kamuela athletic field, thousands of Leathernecks assembled to cheer the “Rockey Sluggers.”

The Division band, directed by Lieutenant Leon Freda, played in every part of the camp, while the

Division orchestra, under Lieutenant Robert (Bob) Crosby, assisted by Sergeant "Tubby" Oliver, gave swing concerts and furnished music for various shows.

In these last months of 1944 the 5th Division continued to grow. Fleet Marine Force, Pacific, not only added the 31st Naval Construction Battalion, but also attached the 11th Amphibian Tractor Battalion, the 5th Joint Assault Signal Company, and the 3d Platoon of the 2d Laundry Company. DUKWs also rolled into Camp Tarawa as the 5th Amphibian Truck Company was activated in the Motor Transport Battalion. All these new units joined Division service troops under Colonel Gally.

► IWO NEXT

IN THE MIDST of this program General Rockey and key members of his staff were ordered to report to Pearl Harbor for a conference. There they were told that the 5th Division would be assigned to V Amphibious Corps and that it would fight in the next Pacific campaign. The target was Iwo Jima.

These orders brought about intense activity at Camp Tarawa. A wooden building next to Division headquarters became "The Conference Room," with blacked-out windows and double locks, and barbed wire and a cordon of MPs on constant duty around it. No one could get in without a special pass.

Lieutenant Colonel George A. Roll and his -2 section assistants studied constantly the intelligence summaries from the Pacific battles. The -3 section worked on training orders that called for repeated attacks on a target identified to the Division simply as "Island X"—a target selected to be as much as possible like the 5th Division's sector of Iwo Jima.

Field training continued, and Marines were given an added incentive to dig deep, safe foxholes—the renewed use of live ammunition in firing problems. Complete blackouts were also enforced during maneuvers.

At Hilo, proper combat loading of troops and their equipment onto LSTs was practiced, and the artillery battalions of the 13th Marines went to Maume Beach for special loading exercises with DUKWs, LSTs and LSMs, followed by an overnight voyage to Maui for landing practice. The artillerymen learned how to load and unload their howitzers from the big amphibian trucks, and practiced moving in and out of the great jaws of the LST bow ramps until one Marine was heard to say, "This reminds me of Jonah and the whale."

The 5th Marine Division, with nearly a year of training behind it, was now operating in three highly coordinated combat teams. These continued to assault "Island X" with different combinations of infantry, tanks, artillery and engineers. Division staff members and headquarters groups, already highly competent, continued to write combat orders, records and reports for these maneuvers, and to set up and operate command posts. Every channel of supply and agency of communication was tested time after time under conditions of simulated combat.

While this training was going on there was still time for men whose home states authorized absentee voting to cast their ballots in the November 1944 elections for every office from President of the United States to mayor of their home towns, and to argue heatedly over the merits of the various candidates.

During November, too, Division headquarters again brought National Service Life Insurance to every man's attention. At the end of this drive, statistics showed that 16,821 officers and men had the full $10,000 coverage; 1,121 had partial coverage; and only 62 men had no GI insurance at all.

In November a group of officers from Major General Harry Schmidt's V Amphibious Corps on Maui came to Camp Tarawa for a conference on the Iwo operation with the commander and staff of the 5th Division. At this time the Division learned that 125 officers and 2,500 men would soon join it as battle replacements. It was decided to move these men to Iwo with the assault echelons of the Division and to use most of them first to augment the shore party, and later on as battle replacements. Colonel Bernard Dubel reported and received command of the base echelon of 100 officers and 1,800 men. A Division administrative center was set up in this echelon for the handling of routine paperwork during combat.

Next, Rear Admiral Harry W. Hill, overall commander of the attack force, visited 5th Division Headquarters with members of his staff, and discussed with General Rockey and the Division staff the important phases of the coming operation—the ship-to-shore movement, the use of landing craft, the use of amphibian tractors as floating dumps, and the naval gunfire support. They went into further details about rehearsals soon to be held in the Hawaii area.

More Army and Marine units were attached to the Division during November. The 471st Amphibian Truck Company (Army), composed of Negro troops, brought their DUKWs into camp and were attached to the 13th Marines; the 6th Marine War Dog Platoon joined Division service troops, and the 6th Section of the 726th Signal Aircraft Warning Company (Army) arrived with portable radar sets and was attached to the Division Signal Company. Marines from the 31st Replacement Draft were placed in service troops until a shore party regiment could be formed; the 3rd Provisional Rocket Detachment was activated as part of the Division Ordnance Company; and liaison officers from V Amphibious Corps reported for duty with Division Headquarters.

The target date was a little over two months away. The infantry regiments now ran through 72-hour maneuvers with fighter and dive-bomber support, and at Camp Drews the 11th Amphibian Tractor Battalion under Lieutenant Colonel Roose held practice landings for the three Division combat teams. LVT companies worked with their new tractors, learned their nomenclature and maintenance, tested and checked them and practiced land and sea driving, and radio operation.

One of the final checks on preparation for combat was a showdown inspection of the combat teams and other supporting groups by General Rockey and his staff. Marines stood in boat-group formation with full combat equipment while inspecting teams checked to see that every man's equipment and clothing and the equipment of his unit were complete and serviceable for combat. No Marine—officer or enlisted, including the Commanding General—was excused from this inspection.

The last training phases also saw extensive command practice given to subordinate leaders, for it was known from previous Pacific battles that officer and NCO casualties would be heavy. Therefore officers turned over platoon command to sergeants, and corporals and Pfc's operated as squad leaders.

In December the 27th Replacement Draft reached Camp Tarawa, and was at once assigned to the newly organized 5th Shore Party Regiment along with the Division Pioneer Battalion and the 31st Replacement Draft. Shore party companies were trained to help load the ships of the three transport divisions of the Navy as they arrived at Hilo. The last replacements to join the Division were four hundred men from the Transient Center at Pearl Harbor, and their arrival brought all units of the 5th Marine Division up to their full strength.

The Division continued its CPX training and other last preparations for battle well into December. Least popular of these preparations were typhus, cholera, and plague shots administered by the Division doctors and Corpsmen.

► BREAKING CAMP

VMO-5 WAS THE FIRST UNIT to break camp. It left for Pearl Harbor on December 16, there to practice take-offs and landings on an LST rigged with Brodie gear and then to be loaded aboard a carrier for the voyage to Iwo Jima. Next to leave were LSTs carrying several thousand tents to Guam where V Amphibious Corps engineers were building the camp then planned as the future rehabilitation camp for the 5th Division.

Movement of supplies and equipment to Hilo began on December 20, and there was a final briefing in the Division chapel at which key officers described the part their particular units or sections would play in the battle to come.

In the midst of this activity came one day of peace—Christmas. Captain Leslie W. Babbins, the Division postal officer, and his assistants distributed a mountain of packages, cards and letters that arrived by way of the Fleet Post Office in San Francisco. Thousands of Marines attended Christmas religious services, and then moved on to parties and turkey dinners in every unit mess hall and in the officer, staff, NCO, and enlisted clubs. Work did not stop entirely, however. On Marines await their turn to vote in the Presidential election of 1944 at Camp Tarawa.

Christmas Day the AKA Athene, the first ship assigned to lift the 5th Division, began loading at Hilo. From then on, hundreds of trucks moved night and day across the "Saddle" road or down the coastal highway to the railhead. Men and equipment streamed steadily into the embarkation points at the Hilo docks and the LST beaches. CT 27 began to embark on December 27 aboard the ships of Transport Division 47, and on New Year's Eve reported "all aboard" to General Rocky.

It was hardly possible to conceal completely the movement of a reinforced Marine division. For security, the Hilo port area was restricted to military personnel and civilian dock employees, but on January 2 a suspected attempt at sabotage was discovered. The striking surfaces of five boxes of safety matches had been placed inside of the boxes so that the heads of the matches would rub against them. The boxes had been rolled up in newspapers and stuffed inside a cargo pallet. However, a minute search of the whole dock area and the ships already loaded disclosed no other sabotage attempt.

Early on New Year's Day Colonel Graham's CT 26 and the support group began to load Transport Division 46. On January 4, 1945, the 5th Division command post closed at Camp Tarawa and opened aboard the USS Cecil. Next day the outline of the big island slipped below the horizon and on January 6 the convoy reached Pearl Harbor and there joined Transport Division 47 in anchorage. Four days later Transport Division 48, carrying CT 28, arrived at Pearl, and the entire 5th Marine Division was water-borne and assembled.

It had completed its battle training; its physical condition was excellent and its morale was high.

The 5th was ready for combat.

Off to War

IT LOOKED TO THE MARINES standing on the decks of the transports as if the whole Pacific fleet were assembled at Pearl Harbor. Wherever they looked they could see the gray steel of carriers, battleships and cruisers, and strings of destroyers and smaller men-of-war, and watch the constant activity aboard them. Stretching back into the inner reaches of the harbor in groups of three or four were more transports carrying the 4th Marine Division and V Amphibious Corps units which had loaded at Maui. Gigs and landing craft scurried back and forth from ship to ship and between the ships and the fleet landing. Tankers, water tenders and barges loaded with stores were busy bringing ships to full supply.

Impressive as this was, every Marine had only one question: Would there be liberty? As their transports came into the harbor the men had been able to see the sands of Waikiki glistening white in the sun, the pink towers of the Royal Hawaiian Hotel and the buildings and houses of Honolulu, and the urge to investigate Honolulu and Oahu was a strong one.

They got their answer very soon—shore leave each day for twenty-five per cent of all troops.

Honolulu was eight miles from Pearl Harbor and its streets were full of soldiers, sailors and Marines. There were a hundred men to every girl and only a few fast-working Leathernecks were able to make a "conquest" against that kind of competition. Most of them simply joined the thousands of servicemen who wandered along King Street, Beretania, and Bishop and through Honolulu's "Coney Island." In Hotel Street they found tattoo shops, shooting galleries, hamburger stands, poolrooms, and "have-your-picture-taken-with-a-hula-girl" studios. And in curio shops they could buy Hawaiian craftwork, imported jade and other things from the Orient.

At the Army-Navy "Y" and the USO Club, near the Royal Palace grounds, Marines found writing facilities and game rooms, and food and soft drink bars. Famed Waikiki Beach drew many men but the short, narrow, coral-pocked strip hardly lived up to its descriptions in the travel folders. Having gotten as far as the beach, however, most of the men bathed in the surf and, with less success, tried their luck at surf-boarding.

Back aboard ship officers went to conferences, there to work out all the details of coming rehearsals.

On January 21, aboard LSTs, LSMs and three transport divisions, the 5th moved out of Pearl Harbor for a sixty-mile run to Maui and Kahoolawe Island. In Maalaea Bay, off Maui, the Division spent the first day at debarkation drills. The next day the landing craft hit the beaches, the landing teams dashed ashore—and immediately re-embarked. All waves landed on the third day, carried out a day and a night maneuver ashore, and re-embarked again.

This practice assault was delivered against an area the same size and shape as Iwo Jima, and the physical conditions, on later comparison, proved to be remarkably similar. The heavy dust of the day matched the deep volcanic ash on Iwo, and as at Iwo, the night turned so cold that the men, unprepared for such a change, were miserable.

On the last day of the exercises the Division ran through debarkation drills for a simulated landing supported by naval gunfire and air strikes at tiny Kahoolawe Island.

Then the 5th moved back to Oahu for resupply and for a critique on their performance. Again liberty was granted. This time one-fourth of the troops had regular liberty ashore each day and another fourth could go ashore in organized liberty parties to playing fields and beaches near Pearl Harbor and at Kaneohe Bay, where the Division's Special Service Officer, Lieutenant Colonel Frank DeSantis, and his staff made free beer and soft drinks and plenty of athletic equipment available.

When the last liberty call sounded before the voyage to Iwo, 5th Division Leathernecks headed for Honolulu.

D-day was twenty-three days away—twenty-three days in which the Division would move four thousand miles across the Pacific, stop to refuel and stage at Eniwetok and Saipan, and then make the dash into waters held by the Japanese.

First to move out, on January 22, were thirteen LSTs and twelve LSMs with the 13th Marines, 11th Amphibian Tractor Battalion, 5th Tank Battalion, and 5th Shore Party Regiment aboard, sailing from Kaneohe Bay. Five days later the rest of the 5th Division in Transport Squadron 16 moved into the Pacific from Pearl Harbor.

As the ships left Pearl Harbor, there was still only a handful of Division officers who knew exactly what the target was. During December, however, the Honolulu Advertiser had printed an aerial photograph of bombs falling on Iwo Jima and it had looked very much indeed like "Island X." The intelligence officers of the Division worried deeply when they saw it, but the men had learned the reasons for security and kept their thoughts to themselves. Few, if any, openly discussed the matter.

► TARGET ANNOUNCED

TWO DAYS OUT of Pearl the target was officially announced as Iwo Jima. Immediately the principal shipboard training project became one of familiarizing every man with the operation and the objective. The Division G-2 section and the unit intelligence officers had been working for some time on intelligence studies for troop briefings. They knew everything about that island that months of continual photographing from the air and submarine reconnaissance had disclosed, and now they passed this information on to the troops. Groups of Marines huddled on bows and fantails, on upper-deck gun platforms, and in the holds. Ward-rooms, troop compartments and galleys also became classrooms for briefings on the coming battle. In addition to the other information they received, the men learned the uses of propaganda leaflets and surrender tickets, and were taught to identify enemy aircraft and armored vehicles. Every man went through refresher courses in prisoner-of-war handling, combat first aid, map reading, and the use of passwords and countersigns. Intelligence instructors again briefed the men on Japanese phrases that might be useful in combat and in enemy tactics and methods of fighting.

Each Marine was told the general scheme of maneuver, not only of the 5th Division but also of the other units which would have a part in the battle; the bombing and carrier strikes and naval bombardment of the pre-landing phase were covered in detail. Plaster relief maps of Iwo Jima made by Captain Rex Anderson, Lieutenant Harold Vogel and their engineers were used for orientation, as were small rubber models furnished by V Amphibious Corps and Joint Intelligence Center, Pacific Ocean Areas.

Between the briefings the decks were crowded with troops taking their daily calisthenics or undergoing arms and equipment inspections. And, when the men had a little free time the scuttlebutt flowed knee-deep. On one of the ships the tale centered around a big bird that had followed the transport for several days. On this particular evening the meal served in the galleys of that ship had been creamed chicken—reasonably tasty, too. But after the meal the story spread that the big sea bird had not been seen since noon that day, and some Marines—perhaps fearing the same fate that overtook the Ancient Mariner—accused the cooks of substituting sea bird for chicken on the menu. Fortunately for the cooks the bird turned up again.

On February 5 the convoy reached Eniwetok with its ragged stumps of palms, its beaches littered with debris and its community of quonset huts. In the immense lagoon of the atoll the ships refueled. Staff conferences were held and two days later the convoy steamed back out through the narrow channel to continue on to Saipan, which it reached on February 11. Saipan was a familiar sight to some Marines of the 4th Division and the V Amphibious Corps units; they, together with the 2d Marine Division and the 27th Infantry Division, had captured Saipan and neighboring Tinian in June and July of the year before.

During this stop there was a one-day invasion rehearsal off the west coast of Tinian. Assault waves were boated and dispatched from the line of departure but were not landed. Naval gunfire parties and shore fire-control parties did go ashore, where they carried out simulated missions along with the air support control units. The sea was rough and several Marines were hurt as landing craft bounced up and raked them as they hung on the debarkation nets on the sides of the transports.

The business of transferring assault troops from their transports to LSTs was also a difficult operation in Saipan's unsheltered harbor. It took highly skilled seamanship to unload the troops with their equipment and the large quantities of ammunition they would be needing into the dancing landing craft.

During this final staging in the Marianas Captain Cyrus N. Morgan, air photo interpreter attached to the G-2 section, brought in the latest photographs and intelligence summaries on Iwo Jima, all of which indicated a feverish Japanese effort to increase the strength of the island's defenses. This material was reproduced in photo trailers set up aboard ship and delivered to all units. Air observers under Major Raymond W. Dollins came from their carrier to the Cecil for last-minute briefings. On the Cecil Dollins received news of the birth of a daughter. Eight days later he was the first Marine of the 5th Division to die at Iwo.

Two new units joined the Division at Saipan: the 3d Amphibian Tractor Battalion, under Lieutenant Colonel Sylvester L. Stephan, and two companies of the 2d Armored Amphibian Battalion, under Major Ralph Bevans.

The final briefings over, the convoy and escort vessels left Saipan and headed north to unconquered waters.

It was a four-day run to Iwo Jima.

CHAPTER FIVE

The Target

WHAT DID WE WANT with a beat-up place like Iwo Jima, anyway? To answer that question satisfactorily, we need to look to the overall strategy of the Pacific war, particularly the air strategy. Ground advances during 1944 had whittled down the Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere until American land-based bombers were within striking range of the Empire itself. In November, Marianas-based B-29s had begun regular attacks on the enemy homeland. These attacks had been effective but had not by any means achieved the level of destruction needed to knock out or seriously cripple Japanese war production. Also, losses in planes and crews had been heavy. China-based B-29s had struck, too, but they had to be supplied by air and their bases, insecure from ground attack, were too far from primary targets.

The Joint Chiefs of Staff reviewed the situation. Japan was a weather factory for much of the Pacific area—cradle of storms, target of typhoons, meeting place of tropical winds and arctic gales. At times 200-mile-an-hour winds blew at thirty thousand feet. For the B-29s this meant into-the-wind speeds of fifty to one hundred miles an hour or down-wind speeds of five hundred miles an hour. Pilots had their choice: drift slowly into antiaircraft fire and fighter interception or move too fast for accurate bombing.

Even without these handicaps bombing from twenty thousand to thirty thousand feet was a bit short of pickle-barrel accuracy. If the B-29s could come down to five thousand to ten thousand feet with fighter protection, Japan would feel the kind of bombing that Germany had felt.

But as things stood, Saipan-based B-29s made the 3,000-mile round trip without escort. Air Force Mustangs and Thunderbolts simply did not have that kind of range, and there were no intermediate bases.

Over Tokyo, Osaka, Nagoya and other targets, the big silver planes had met with determined resistance. Antiaircraft fire was thick and often accurate. Enemy fighter planes swarmed up to meet the raiders. If their attacks failed, Kamikaze pilots frequently rammed the bombers.

Between the take-off from the Marianas and landing again, the Superforts had no place to come down in case of motor trouble, damage, or bad weather. Plane crews in trouble had a good chance of rescue if they “ditched” between Iwo Jima and Saipan. Here Dumbo (rescue) planes could probably pick them up. Planes damaged so badly that they could fly only a few hundred miles out of Tokyo nearly always were lost.

But Iwo Jima in Japanese hands was not only not an asset; it was a positive menace. Japanese planes based on Iwo’s two airfields had been raiding bomber strips on Saipan and destroying and damaging the big four-motored planes. Fighters from Iwo were also intercepting the B-29s on their long flight to Japan, and then coming up again to pick off cripples limping back to the Marianas.

To America the capture of Iwo meant the start of a devastating air offensive against Japan; it meant doubling the payload of bombs; it meant opening the front door to the Japanese homeland; it meant speeding the end of the war. This forward push against the enemy would forge another link in the chain which was beginning to throttle the Japanese Empire. Taking Iwo from the Japs was, the Joint Chiefs of Staff decided, a “must.”

The effect of their decision was felt in many places and in many ways.

From European waters venerable battleships which had pounded the Normandy beachhead were ordered into the Pacific. In the United States supplies piled up in ports and railheads from New York to California. Navy printing presses in Hawaii began grinding out grid maps. More than four thousand miles west of Pearl Harbor periscopes of American submarines poked through the rough waters around Iwo while observers aboard dictated what they saw into wire recorders. Naval officers of the top Pacific Fleet commands and the Marines at FMFPAC, V Amphibious Corps, and divisions began detailed planning for the operation. Marine camps in Hawaii and Guam, and replacement centers in the United States showed signs of intensified activity.

Housewives in Honolulu began to notice a shortage of butter and meat. Some stands on Kalahaua and Hotel Street closed—no hamburger. Loading operations were begun on the tremendous floating naval supply base necessary to sustain the operation. Into its ships went enough food to feed Columbus, Ohio, for thirty days; enough candy, shaving cream and other items to stock six thousand drug stores. A hundred million cigarettes were stowed aboard.

What sort of an island was this whose imminent seizure was stirring up all this commotion? Strategically important—we know that! But what did it look like? What earthly use had it been to anybody before it was decided we needed an airfield on it?

Iwo Jima (Sulphur Island) was the principal island in the Volcano Islands group—the Kazan Retto. This, in turn, was part of a larger island group, including the Bonins, known as the Nanpo Shoto. The entire chain extended more than seven hundred miles from the entrance of Tokyo Bay south to within three hundred miles of the Northern Marianas. It was part of the strong inner ring of Japanese Empire defenses and Iwo was the key to the whole system.

Before the war Americans knew little about these islands. Like all of the Japanese-owned or mandated territories in the Pacific, they were closed to American and European observers and tourists.

Japanese fisherman used the Nanpo Shoto at intervals following their discovery in 1593 but the first permanent settlement was established in 1830 by emigrants from the Hawaiian Islands. Seven years earlier a Captain Coffin, an American whaler, had claimed the southern group for the United States and in 1827 Captain Beechey had proclaimed British sovereignty over the entire archipelago. Neither of these claims was backed by the home governments, despite a strong plea from Commodore Perry after his opening of Japan that an American naval base or coaling station be established in that area. Japan asserted her claim to all twenty-seven islands in 1861.

The Volcano Islands—Iwo Jima and its two sharp-peaked neighboring Islands, Kita Iwo Jima and Bombs away! Air Corps bombers from the Marianas established a daily milk run over Iwo prior to the assault.

Minami Iwo Jima—were annexed by the Japanese Empire in 1891 and were put under the same government as the Bonins. The Japanese themselves attached little importance to Iwo and described it in their geography books only as “an island of sulphur springs, with no water, no sparrow, and no swallow”—an apt description, as Marines discovered.

In 1940 Iwo's civilian population was estimated at 1,091, most of whom lived at Motoyama in the northeast part of the island. Their race and language were Japanese. A sugar mill was located near the town and some sugar was exported. There was also a small sulphur refinery on the island which furnished enough of this commodity to Japan to make its continued operation worthwhile, but very little more. For the most part, however, Iwo was of little value to Japan from any standpoint other than military.

Although the first airfield was built there in 1943

as an intermediate aircraft base from Japan to the Marianas, it was not until Truk was raided by a carrier task force in February 1944 that the Japanese began to think much of Iwo in connection with their war strategy. At this time there were only 1,500 naval airmen and twenty airplanes based on the island.

Just one year before the scheduled American landing the first Japanese Army defense forces—three thousand strong—moved in. There were no fortifications then. Had American forces launched their attack at that time, Iwo, a captured Japanese officer admitted later, would have been overrun in two days.

The northern half of the island is roughly circular in shape, forming a broad dome with maximum elevation about 380 feet. It is two and a half miles wide at its widest point. From this northern dome a projection extends five miles southwestward with a 1-in-5 slope to an elevation of about a hundred feet. The island tapers to a width of half a mile at the base of 554-foot Mount Suribachi.

The north coast is rough and rocky, dominated by serrated cliffs and obstructed by boulders. The only available landing beaches were on the southeastern and western shores. Of these, the former seemed better. They make up about fifty per cent of the eastern shoreline and extend northward from the base of Suribachi for two miles where they end in high, rocky cliffs. Beaches were unobstructed by natural features except for three rocky outcrops offshore known as Futasune. Several terraces of varying height and width caused by heavy storms fringed the beaches, but it was considered that movement inland would be generally good, though perhaps difficult for all wheeled vehicles.

Even though analysis of many years of weather data made it almost certain that the landing, if it were made in February, would be made over the southeastern beaches, the "almost" still had to be considered. The western beach was therefore selected as an alternate landing area, equally detailed studies having been made of it. The final decision would depend upon the condition of the sea, surf and weather.

► THE ISLAND DEFENSES

THE STORY of how the Japanese on Iwo Jima worked feverishly to construct their defenses is told in aerial photographs taken periodically from June 1944 until D-day in February 1945. At the time Saipan was invaded only antiaircraft guns, hasty fire trenches, and preliminary beach defenses had been prepared. By September 1944, positions had been constructed in depth behind the beaches, and concrete pillboxes and covered artillery emplacements were being built. In December photographs showed most beach positions were completed and had been strengthened by the construction of heavy concrete blockhouses. A cross-island defense line in depth protecting the northern part of the island was springing up along the high ground north of Airfield No. 1.

Additional AA defenses, increasing numbers of coast defense guns, and well protected artillery and mortar positions plus numerous minefields were noted on each succeeding photographic sortie. By D-day key positions had been connected with pillboxes and were protected by covering fire from artillery, antitank guns and mortars, all previously sited to pour flanking fire onto possible landing beaches. The excellent observation from the heights of Suribachi and the high ground around Airfield No. 2 were the key to controlled fire from these weapons.

Although intelligence prior to the invasion of Iwo indicated a formidable garrison force of thirteen thousand men (revised upward as D-day approached) with many major-caliber weapons and extensive tank and personnel obstacles, the aerial photographs and maps showed only a limited picture of one of the enemy's best defensive weapons—the terrain. The ground, extremely rough and broken, gave excellent cover for emplacements, and expert camouflage blended into the surrounding terrain so well that many were not detected until gunfire blew away this concealment. Vegetation (before it was destroyed by the powerful invasion barrage) gave a levelling effect to much of the island and the jumbled ground formation which later formed a perfect natural defense area was not fully appreciated before the landing.

The eastern beach area contained an elaborate trench system and well constructed blockhouses, concrete pillboxes, and revetted fire pits for enemy infantry. The position of Airfield No. 1 limited the depth of these positions to about 500–700 yards. Defenses on the west beaches were more extensive and elaborate with considerably longer fields of fire and numerous caves and underground shelters well protected from naval gunfire and bombs. Suribachi's defenses appeared to be a maze of concrete pillboxes, bunkers, shelters, and blockhouses in the terraced slopes leading to the big volcano. These were capable of all-around defense and were mutually supporting. In addition, there was an equally elaborate subsurface system of shelters, passageways, living quarters, storage areas, and cave-type firing positions which provided adequate protection against the heavy preliminary bombardment.

The main defensive belt on Iwo began in the rocky cliffs north of the western beaches and stretched east across the island to skirt the southern end of Airfield No. 2, terminating at the northern end of the eastern (landing) beaches. The center of this belt was 2,600 yards deep. It gained its strength from its depth and from its concrete and steel structures located to tie in with the overall defense system. Reliance on caves as both shelters and fighting positions was increased here. Communications were maintained by underground or trenched wire, radios, and a labyrinth of underground tunnels connecting all areas. Artillery, including heavy mortars and rockets, was emplaced in and behind this main defense belt.

In the extreme northern part of the island there were obviously fewer reinforced concrete positions, but thousands of caves on the forward and reverse slopes of ridges and rocky outcrops gave an all-around interlocking defense to each small area.

Photographs showed overall field fortifications to be adequate for only four of the nine infantry battalions believed to be on the island. Five battalions, including tanks, would be held in reserve, intelligence officers believed, ready to join a counterattack on the night of D-day.

The man responsible for Fortress Iwo was Lieutenant General Tadamichi Kuribayashi, 54, Commanding General of the Japanese Army's 109th Division and the Bonins-Volcano Defense Sector. This man differed from most Japanese commanders. He had been in Canada for two years and had visited the United States. American industry and its mass production methods had impressed him. To Kuribayashi, guns, ships, and many troops won battles.

"Give me these things," he later radioed Tokyo, "and I will hold Iwo."

Kuribayashi was a cavalry officer who fought the Russians in the undeclared Russo-Japanese war in 1938–39 and later became commander of the Imperial Guard Regiment at the Emperor's Palace in Tokyo. When American forces invaded Saipan he was ordered to the homeland's outer defense ring, where he set up headquarters on Iwo and administered it as part of Tokyo's own prefecture.

At first he speculated with the idea of sinking the island into the sea or cutting it in half to destroy the airfield in case of invasion. This being quite impossible he turned instead to making Iwo Jima the most heavily fortified piece of real estate in the world. However, Kuribayashi had other problems.

After August 1944, American planes and submarines had so choked the supply route to Iwo Jima that its garrison had only thirty days' supply of rice and fifteen days of supplementary food. In two months the Japanese lost 1,500 men and fifty thousand tons of foodstuffs and equipment trying to run the blockade, and Kuribayashi resorted to desperate measures. He ordered sailing boats and fishing vessels to make the run from Chichi Jima at night. The lack of a good harbor, rough weather, and almost daily air raids made this supply line precarious, but by February, troops on Iwo had seventy days' supply of rice, plus other rations which could be made to last for two months.

His troops were, in addition, faced with a continuous water shortage, and were forced to collect rain in barrels and bottles and store it for later use. There were no fresh vegetables on the island and twenty per cent of the troops suffered from malnutrition and paratyphoid.

Our own command structure was considerably more complex than that of the Japanese. Admiral Raymond A. Spruance's Fifth Fleet was the top command while Vice Admiral Richmond Kelly Turner led the Joint Expeditionary Forces. Rear Admiral Harry W. Hill, commanding the attack forces, had the mission of transporting and landing troops. The amphibious support force, under Rear Admiral William H. P. Blandy, was concerned with pre-D-day air and gunboat support, mine sweeping, beach reconnaissance, and underwater demolition. The battleships, cruisers, and destroyers which would bombard Iwo and cover the island against enemy surface and air attack, made up the gunfire and covering force under Rear Admiral Bertram J. Rogers.

Lieutenant General Holland M. Smith commanded the expeditionary troops. These consisted of all assault units plus the Army's 147th Infantry Regiment from Noumea, which was assigned to garrison the island after its capture. The landing force was Major General Harry Schmidt's V Amphibious Corps.

The landing force plan called for the 4th and 5th Marine Divisions to land abreast at H-hour on D-day with the 3d Marine Division in floating reserve—to land if and when needed. Both the 3d and 4th Divisions had seen considerable action; the 5th was facing its first test.

Major General Clifton B. Cates' 4th Division had been activated at Camp Pendleton in August 1943. General Schmidt, its first commander, led it during the capture of Roi-Namur in the Marshalls in January 1944. Five months later the 4th invaded Saipan along with the 2d Marine Division and 27th Infantry Division. In July, General Cates had taken the division into nearby Tinian after which it had returned to Maui for rehabilitation.

The 3d Division had first met the Japanese on Bougainville in November 1943, under Major General Allen Hal Turnage. In July 1944, it joined with the 1st Provisional Marine Brigade to recapture Guam. With the division still on that island, Major General Graves B. Erskine took command in October 1944. Now his men were afloat and prepared to help the 4th and 5th.

► PRE-INVASION BOMBARDMENT

THE SOFTENING UP of Iwo Jima really began with the Saipan operation. To help cover that landing on June 15, 1944, planes from Admiral Marc Mitscher's 121-ship task force made a two-day strike at Iwo and other islands between Saipan and the Marianas, destroying aircraft and damaging and sinking a number of ships.¹

Other raids by carrier-based planes came on June 24, July 4, August 4 and 5, and again between August 31 and September 2. Iwo's airfields and other installations were bombed, strafed, and hit with rockets from carrier aircraft and also were bombarded by surface ships. Although these raids inflicted considerable damage, the defensive works were unimpaired at the time of the pre-landing naval gunfire strike and were, in fact, spurred on to completion by these raids by American aircraft.

On July 10, Liberators of the Seventh Air Force, operating from new bases in the Marianas, bombed Iwo Jima and Chichi Jima in the first large-scale attack by land-based aircraft. Two or three bombing missions a week followed during the next few months. The Japanese, however, patched their runways within one day after each raid and the island's airfields remained semi-operational.

Iwo Jima dropped from the news until November 11 and 12 when naval surface forces bombarded it again. From that time on the Navy gave increasing attention to the lonely, black mountain top nosing out of the central Pacific. Air-surface strikes came on December 8, 24, and 27, 1944, and on January 5 and 24, 1945. At the same time B-29s and B-24 Liberators from the Marianas established a daily "milk run" to Iwo.

The curtain went up on the invasion itself on February 16 (D minus 3). A fast carrier force under Admiral Mitscher steamed close to Japan proper and under a low, rainy ceiling launched its planes for a strike at the Tokyo and Nagoya-Kobe areas. This surprise smash destroyed several hundred enemy aircraft and spread alarm throughout the enemy homeland. After withdrawing, Mitscher's task force refueled, then sent the battleships North Carolina and Washington, and the cruisers Birmingham and Biloxi, to take part in the bombardment of Iwo which had begun the same day as the Empire strike.

Rain and heavy weather prevented Admiral Blandy from carrying out his full plan for softening up Iwo. On the first day air strikes had to be cancelled and spotting planes were handicapped in picking out targets ashore. Ships fired, however, whenever weather permitted, and minesweeping operations were carried out to within six thousand yards of the beaches. At sunset ships withdrew from the island except for four destroyers, which remained to provide harassing fire and illumination and to prevent reinforcement of the garrison.

The next day air and naval bombardment of the island was resumed despite continuing bad weather, and in the face of more determined opposition from the shore. The cruiser Pensacola was crippled by six direct hits from the big coast-defense guns. The enemy was more active in the air on this day, too. In the early morning three twin-engine planes attacked the USS Halligan on picket duty twenty-four miles north of Iwo, but she drove off the attackers, shooting down one Betty.

By late morning minesweepers had completed their sweep of the eastern beaches and underwater demolition team reconnaissance commenced. As the LCI gunboats carrying these teams moved in toward the beach, enemy fire began to concentrate on them.

These tiny ships took terrific punishment. All twelve were hit and suffered heavy damage and casualties. Despite this opposition, swimmers from the underwater demolition group under Navy Captain B. H. Hanlon left their six APDs and successfully carried out a search for beach obstructions and minefields. Underwater Demolition Teams 12, 13, 14 and 15, along with Captain Robert C. Reynolds and nine men from his 5th Reconnaissance Company, returned aboard ship later that day to report that the beaches were clear. General Kuribayashi, meanwhile, reported somewhat optimistically to Tokyo that he had repulsed an American landing attempt.

Now battleships, cruisers, destroyers and other fire support ships began destructive short-range fire against beach defenses. When they withdrew for the night, however, hastily developed photographs showed that the greater part of the known defense installations still remained undamaged. Orders were issued for the following day to provide heavy concentrations of fire on blockhouses, pillboxes, and other installations in the eastern beach area and on its flanks.

On D minus 1, troops aboard transports of the invasion fleet, using ships' radio receivers, listened to a "blow-by-blow" description of one of the greatest fights ever broadcast. They heard aerial observers in spotting planes call for fire on targets below, then report their destruction.

On the night of February 18—the eve of the scheduled landing—top Navy and Marine commanders pored over the latest photographs and reports. These seemed to indicate that the principal defense installations on and behind the eastern beaches and on their flanks had been either destroyed or heavily damaged. To effect this destruction, however, inland defenses had been neglected and many were untouched. During the evening Admiral Blandy informed Admiral Turner that, although weather had prevented expending the full ammunition allowance and more installations could be found and destroyed with an additional day of bombardment, he believed a successful landing could be made the next day if necessary.

It was decided, after consultation among the Navy commanders responsible, that the landing would be made the next day, February 19, with H-hour at 0900. That decision was and is one of the most controversial made in the course of the Pacific war; bitter remarks have been passed as to the wisdom of landing the 4th and 5th Marine Divisions in full knowledge that most of Iwo Jima's inland defenses were intact. This is, however, a sort of "chicken and egg" controversy, one that doubtless will never be settled to anyone's satisfaction if, indeed, it can be settled.

The V Corps' order prescribed that the Division (less CT 26, in V Amphibious Corps reserve) would land on Green and Red Beaches at H-hour, and seize the 0-1 Line and that part of Iwo south of the 0-1 Line in its zone of action, being prepared to seize the 0-2 Line as its next objective.

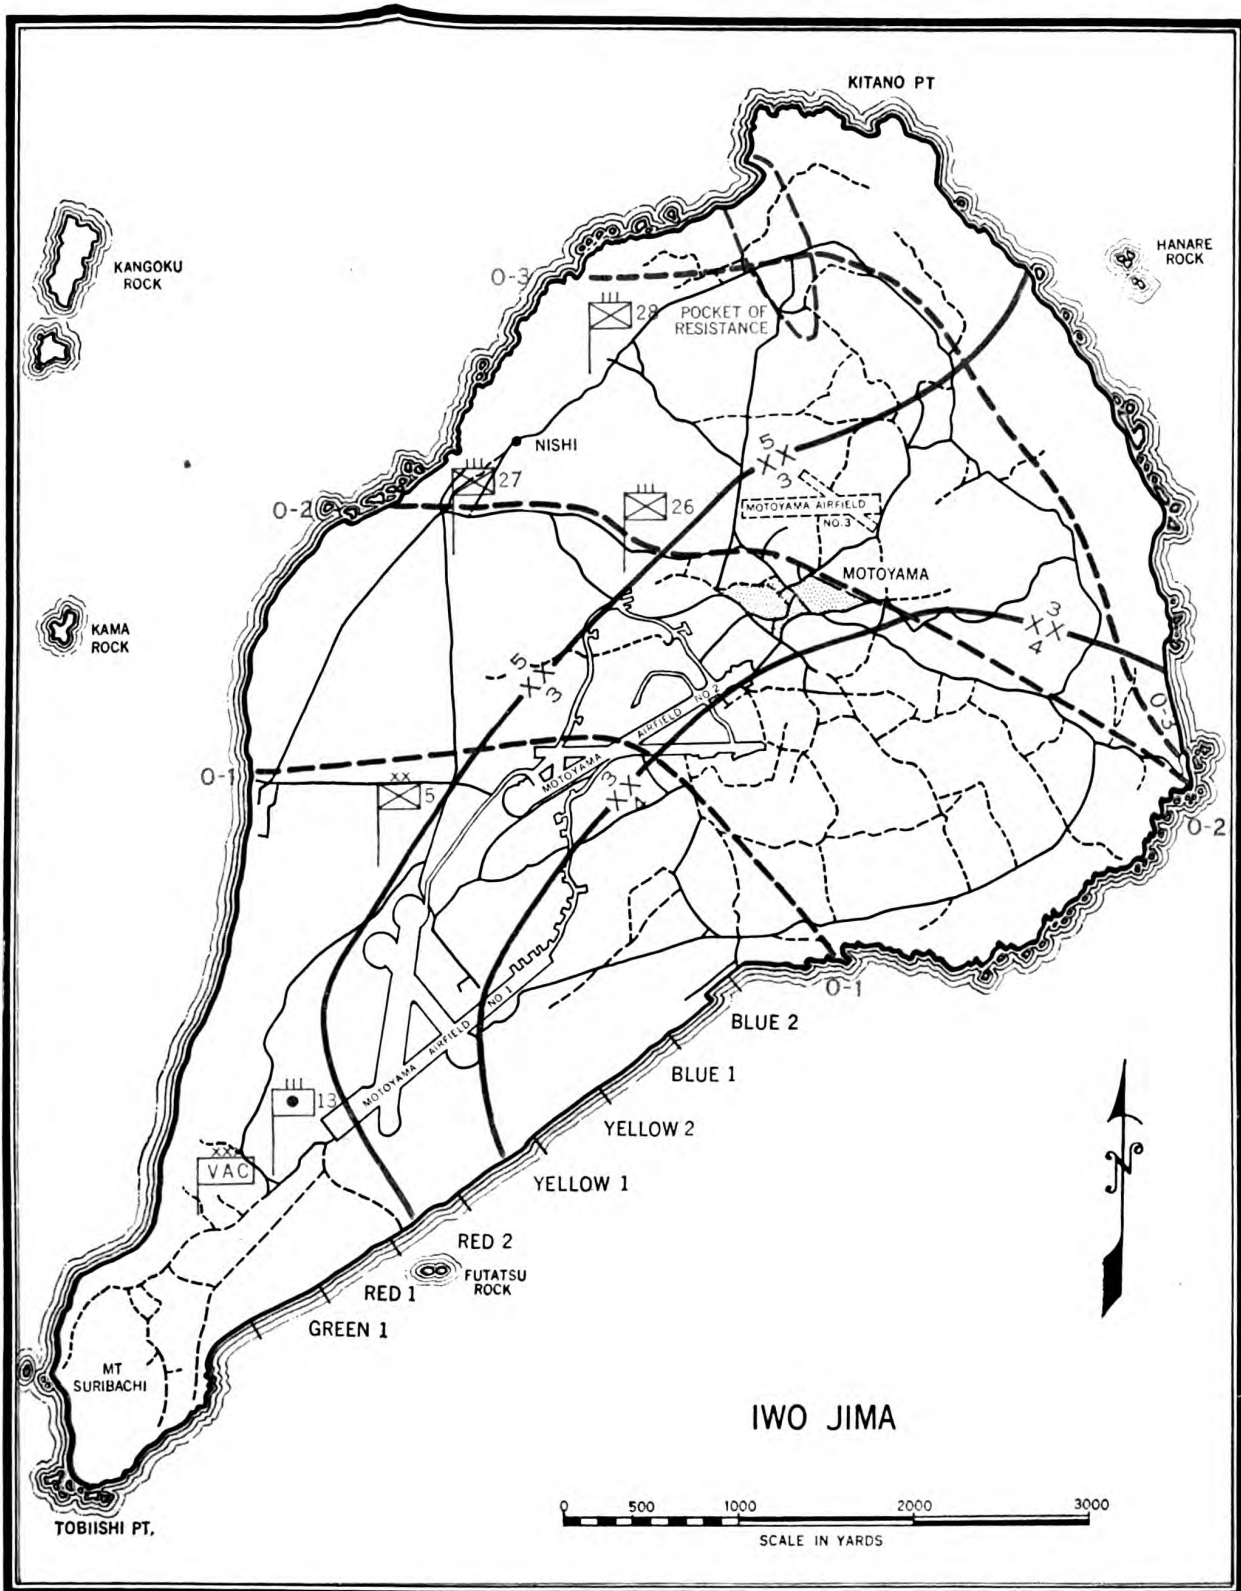

The Division was landing with CT 27 and CT 28 (less LT 3/28, in Division reserve) abreast, CT 27 landing on Beaches Red 1 and 2 and CT 28 (less 3/28) on Beach Green. This put CT 28 on the left (south) of the line and CT 27 on the right (north) of the line as one faced the beaches.

On the right of CT 27, the 4th Marine Division was landing.

The effect of this plan was that the 5th Marine Division would cut off Suribachi from the rest of the island, to be dealt with separately, and would then pivot north, advancing up Iwo's long axis along the western half of the island.

And that was the way it worked out, although not nearly as simply as it appears in these paragraphs and not without bringing in the 3d Marine Division from its position in floating reserve.

D-day

THE GRAY STREAKS of the Central Pacific dawn caught Iwo Jima at exactly 0640 on February 19, 1945. As the blackness dissolved and the outline of the island sharpened, it was caught, too, by something else. Warships of the U. S. Pacific Fleet opened the pre-invasion bombardment.

Streaming toward the transport area about ten thousand yards offshore were the troop-carrying ships of the invasion armada. Aboard, fifty thousand Marines gobbled a breakfast of steak and eggs, then hustled topside for a look at this island we wanted so badly.

Directly ahead Iwo Jima's shadowy land mass sloped up from the sea. Splashes of red flickered along its purplish hump and melted into exploding billows of smoke and dust. Suribachi, obscured by this man-made blanket, gave thousands of straining eyes aboard ship only periodic glimpses of its sharp, vertical cone.

This long-awaited sight heightened the last-minute tension felt alike by veterans of previous operations and by the first-timers counted among the thousands in the landing force.

The men who studied the sharpening scene were thoughtful men, regardless of what they might have said or done. Everything had been done for them that an efficient military organization could do—their equipment was probably the best in the world; they had been well fed; they had attended religious services; they had been intelligently and thoroughly briefed; they were, and would continue to be, a tough, efficient team. Yet at this moment, each man was alone to think his own thoughts and make his peace with himself. Probably few men who watched Iwo loom before them thought about it as a final resting place or as a place where they, themselves, were apt to receive personal harm or injury. It was always some other poor devil who was killed or wounded—never you. The human mind is indeed a strange and wonderful thing.

It was apparent that the landing force had had a lucky break in the weather. The sea was relatively smooth and surf conditions were as satisfactory as they ever are on a small island exposed to the full force of the sea. The sky was clear, visibility virtually unlimited, temperature 68 degrees, and wind eight to ten knots from the north.

From 0640 until 0805 ships of Admiral Rogers' Gunfire and Covering Force hurled tons of high explosives into the pear-shaped island. Shell bursts flicked flame, smoke, and chunks of Iwo into the air and pocked ashy soil until it looked not unlike the moon's surface. Suribachi's crater steamed from successive hits along its lip. Blasts rocked the landing beaches, the airfields, and the jagged northern area while gunboats, firing rockets and mortars, blasted suspected inflammables along the water's edge. Each minute the bombardment rose in intensity until the salvos merged into a continuous dull drum-beat.

Gun crews of the North Carolina, Washington, New York, and Texas seemed to be trying to blow the island out of the sea. Even the old Arkansas, used for years to train midshipmen, and the Nevada, which had been knocked out at Pearl Harbor and later reconditioned, added their voices to the chorus of destruction.

At 0805 the drone of airplane motors replaced the roar of naval gunfire. Ships ceased fire as seventy-two carrier-based fighters and dive bombers pounded the beach flanks with bombs and rockets. Behind them, forty-eight fighters dipped in to drop fiery Napalm, loose more rockets, and then strafe the landing areas. Approaching from high altitude, a covey of B-24 Liberators from Saipan, shining in the early sun, peppered the island with heavy bombs.

Suribachi boils out smoke and flame as the assault troops start into the beach

First to land. These 5th Reconnaissance Company swimmers made a D minus 2 inspection of Iwo's beaches and reported them clear of obstructions.

The air strike ended at H minus 35 and the ships immediately resumed firing, concentrating on the landing beaches and their flanks and mixing air bursts into the barrage to cover the few open emplacements. As fires smoldered along the island's central spine, only the top of Suribachi showed above the blanket of smoke and dust. But even under this concentrated destruction the Japanese were fighting back. As the Division's chief air observer, Major Dollins, flew over Green Beach, reporting to the CP afloat on the landing of the assault waves, a burst of antiaircraft fire caught his plane and it crashed into the sea between the fourth and fifth waves of landing craft off Green Beach. Major Dollins was killed.

► THE LANDING

THE FIRST WAVES of Marines, now aboard their amtracs, began to zig-zag in columns through the landing ship area, past a line of close-in fire support ships. At 0830 they spread out in wave formation opposite control vessels at the line of departure, four thousand yards offshore. Led by mortar-firing gunboats and LCIs spitting rockets and 40mm shells, the first wave of armored amtracs started into the beach. Behind this wave came five waves of LVTs carrying the assault companies and a wave of tank-carrying LCMs. As they neared the beaches, the armored amtracs peeled off to either flank of the following waves, and supported their landings by fire.

At H minus 15, from positions two thousand yards offshore, warships began a rolling barrage of naval gunfire, shifting their impact areas on a prearranged schedule to conform with the movement of the ground forces. This short bombardment, in the words of a prisoner captured later, "was terrifying," but it did not cause many casualties. The Japanese, however, were driven deeply into their holes and defenses near the landing beaches were thoroughly blitzed.

Top: Grim, determined assault troops, faces covered with anti-flash burn cream, prepare to board amtracs for the run into Red and Green beaches. Bottom: Assault troops in LVTs await the shove-off order at the line of departure.

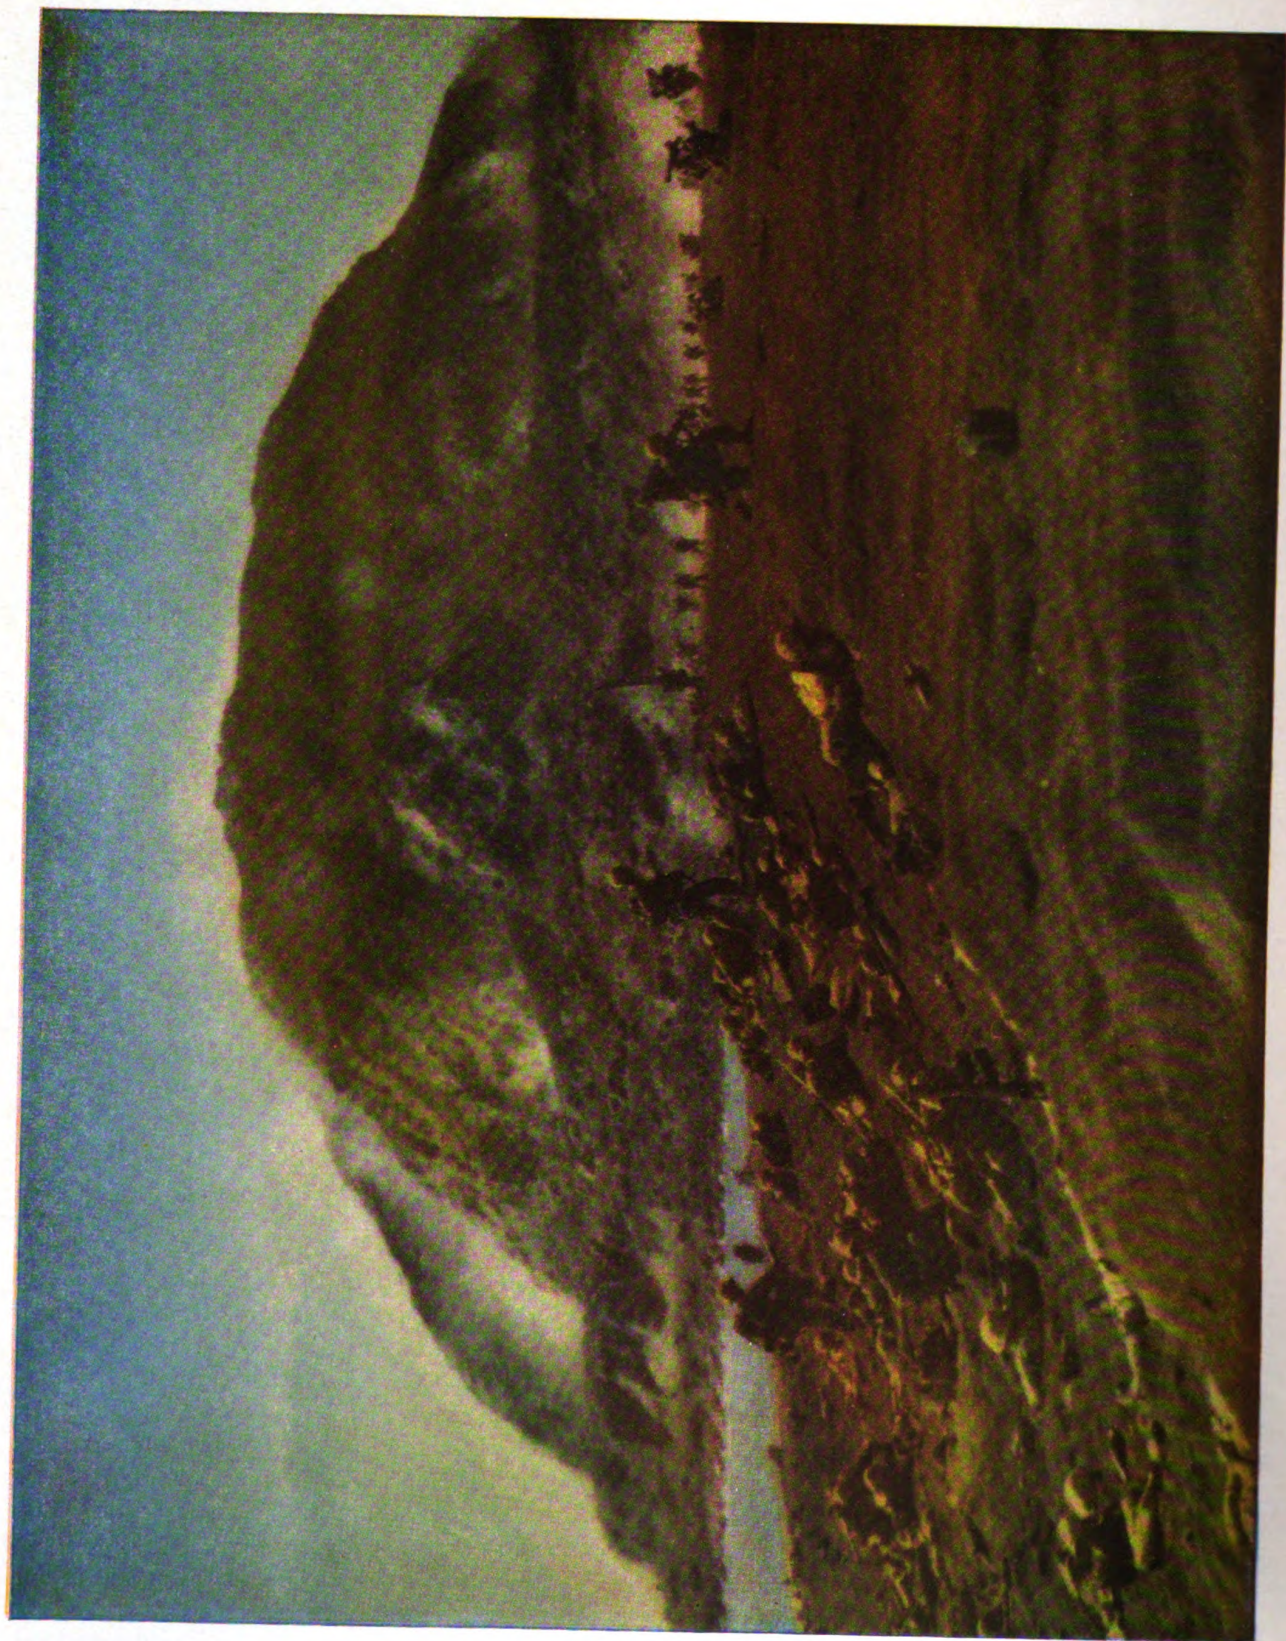

It should be noted, however, that the overall bombardment program, beginning at D minus 3, was effective and caused, according to a Major Hara who commanded forces in the beach area and who was later captured and interrogated, about fifty per cent casualties in his unit. Unhappily, not all of Iwo Jima was as thoroughly blasted as the beach area.

Precisely at H-hour, 0900, seven battalions of the 4th and 5th Marine Divisions landed abreast on the southeastern shore of Iwo Jima. On the most southerly beach, Green 1, near the base of Mt. Suribachi. Lieutenant Colonel Jackson B. Butterfield led LT

1/28 ashore. North (right, facing the beach) of Green 1, Major John W. Antonelli's LT 2/27 and Lieutenant Colonel John A. Butler's LT 1/27 hit Red Beaches 1 and 2, respectively. Still farther north, the 4th Marine Division came ashore.

Amber parachute flares floated over the area, signifying to the command ships and to the Marines still aboard transports or already boated in landing craft that the assault waves had landed.

The enemy was either still stunned or still in the process of coming up from shelters to man firing positions as the initial waves of amtracs ground across the beaches toward the higher ground inland, for the fire that greeted them ranged from slight to moderate.

At this point, however, the island asserted itself. The soft, volcanic sand slowed the lurching amtracs as they moved higher onto the beach finally to be stopped altogether by the 5- to 18-foot terraces directly inland. These had been thrown up by storms in 1943 and were known to exist. Colonel Butler and Major Antonelli had, in fact, had scaling ladders constructed and carried in with the first wave in case the troops needed them to cross these obstacles.

As soon as the amtracs were stopped the troops leaped to the ground—and immediately sank over their shoetops in the loose, ashy soil. Their forward movement became grim plodding as Iwo tugged at their feet and made every step an individual effort.

The Japanese opposition to Marine advances up the sloping sides of the island continued light until the attack had carried inland about three hundred yards. Here the troops were sprinkled, then showered, and finally deluged by mortar and artillery fire from Suribachi and the north. Men began to claw the gray, coarse sand with their hands and feet in an effort to get under the surface.

Heavy shells soon began to pelt the entire landing area. The accuracy of this fire never varied as Japanese spotters on high ground on both sides looked down on advancing Marines. These shells made noises varying in pitch and intensity from the almost inaudible whishhhhhh, whishhhhhh, of the feared mortar shell to the agonized howl of big-gun shells coming in or going overhead—except for the ones that hit too close; those were the ones the man who needed to hear them never heard.

The loose, slipping sand offered the pinned-down Marines poor cover at best. Foxholes filled in almost as fast as a man could shovel, and urgent requests for sandbags poured in from all over the front.

Over on the right, at Yellow and Blue Beaches, the 4th Division found the same heavy resistance developing fifteen minutes after its 23d and 25th Marines had landed. Shells cascaded down on the 5th's brother division as General Kuribayashi's troops swarmed up from underground shelters to man their pieces.

► ADVANCE INLAND

FLOUNDERING from one shell hole to the next as fast as they could, troops of the leading battalions were making progress toward the western beaches of the island and toward the initial objective of cutting off Mt. Suribachi from the rest of Iwo Jima.

By 1030, an hour and a half after H-hour, LT 1/27, on the north of the Division zone, was passing the southern end of Airfield No. 1, a little less than halfway across the island. In the process, however, one of the Marine Corps' greatest fighters was mortally wounded. Gunnery Sergeant John Basilone, who had won the Medal of Honor at Guadalcanal with the 1st Marine Division, was leading his machine-gun platoon up the slopes toward the airfield when a mortar shell ripped into his fresh footprints. Four men with him were killed. (General Rockey later recommended that Airfield No. 1 be renamed "Basilone Field" but Navy policy forced Admiral Nimitz to disapprove the request.)

Farther south LT 2/27 was having its troubles. Moving inland from Red Beach 1, it had run into heavy fire from light machine guns, rifles, and grenades and had hit its first pillbox about fifty yards in from the beach. When the Japanese opened fire, Corporal Joseph E. Hotovchin achieved the doubtful distinction of becoming the unit's first casualty.

However, the leading companies had their orders:

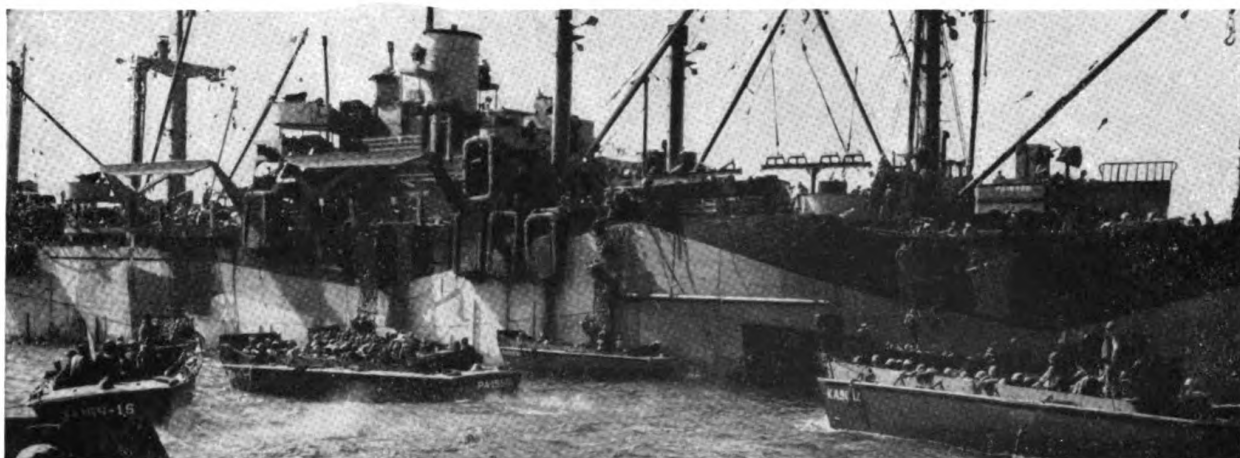

Although men nearby are pinned down, a lone Marine struggles up the shell-spanked slope with his machine gun.

Gunnery Sergeant John Basilone—"Manila John." First enlisted Marine to win the Medal of Honor in World War II, he was killed during the D-day assault.

get across the island—fast. Accordingly, E and F Companies by-passed as many Japanese installations as possible, knocking out only those that threatened to hold up the advance. Flamethrower teams and grenade-tossing riflemen killed the Japanese inside while engineer teams shattered the emplacements with explosive charges. At 1115 several tanks also turned up to support the attack, but their assistance was somewhat counterbalanced by the fact that they were prime targets for mortar fire which caused heavy casualties among the infantrymen.

Behind the assault companies of the two battalions, reserve companies cleared by-passed pillboxes and dug out Japanese machine-gun nests. LT 3/27, which had been in combat team reserve, landed at 1130 and followed the 2d Battalion inland, mopping up as they moved along.

On the extreme south flank of the beachhead, the first wave of armored amtracs took positions near the base of Suribachi and fired into enemy positions in the mountain's side. Ahead of the vehicles LT 1/28 pushed ahead against stiffening resistance from pillboxes, blockhouses, and dugouts. Colonel Butterfield used his mortars with considerable success to cut down Japanese who had been flushed from their emplacements and were out in the open, but the business of moving forward was still no easy proposition.

Every yard of advance made another Marine hero. Captain Dwayne E. Mears personally assaulted a pillbox which blocked the advance of his B Company, CT 28. Seriously hit, he continued to direct his men until he was too weak to talk. To his right, Captain P. E. Roach, the C Company commander, fell wounded while leading his men. Marines who became separated from their platoons worked independently but continued to push across the island's narrow neck.

In battle, no man can be singled out as having been "first" to fight or as having been solely responsible for the success of an attack, but one man in Company A, 28th Marines, came as close, perhaps, as any man can come to fulfilling these impossible conditions. He was Corporal Tony Stein. Armed with a specially improvised air-cooled machine gun (called a "stinger") which had been stripped from a wrecked Navy fighter plane in Hawaii, he loosed a torrent of covering fire as his unit moved into position. When the entire company was pinned down by a machine-gun and mortar barrage, Stein jumped to his feet and exposed himself to the enemy, drawing their fire and allowing him to locate the furiously blazing Japanese guns.

Hit by naval gunfire, many pillboxes nevertheless still packed a deadly punch.

Reserve battalions dash ashore and are greeted by withering fire. Mortar and artillery shells follow them as they push across Iwo's narrow neck.

As his company moved across the island, Stein boldly charged pillboxes one by one and killed twenty enemy soldiers during these furious single-handed assaults. When he ran out of ammunition, the corporal stripped off his helmet and shoes to increase his speed and went back to the beach for more. Stein made eight such trips, each time assisting a wounded man. Later in the day he directed the fire of a half-track against a pillbox until it was destroyed.

Finally, when his platoon was forced to withdraw to a new position temporarily, he covered the movement in spite of the fact that his weapon was twice shot out of his hands. Stein died fighting and was posthumously awarded the Medal of Honor.

At 1035 Lieutenant Frank J. Wright, Private First Class Lee H. Zuck, and Private First Class Remo A. Bechelli, all of B Company, LT 1/28, reached a point overlooking the western beaches. They had crossed Iwo Jima at its narrowest point just north of Suribachi, and their arrival at the western shore officially cut off Suribachi from the rest of the island, although it took all hands the rest of the day and bitter fighting to mop up, to be sure that Suribachi stayed cut off.

The blazing pace of LT 1/28's advance across Iwo and the nature of the opposition had had the effect of badly overextending the battalion in depth. It had men strung from eastern to western beaches, and a partly exposed left flank. It was obviously not in a position to launch an immediate attack against Suribachi along with LT 2/28 which had followed it across Green Beach at 0935. LT 2/28, under Lieutenant Colonel Chandler W. Johnson, held a thin, hastily organized line facing south toward the volcano.

Lieutenant Colonel Charles E. Shepard's LT 3/28, which had been in division reserve, was released and landed at 1245, and was immediately ordered into the line to the right of LT 2/28. Heavy fire coming from Suribachi and the north caught Colonel Shepard's men as they came ashore and made their movement extremely costly. It was not until late afternoon that the 3d Battalion was able to edge its way into the line.

In every sector of the Division front, the advance had carried troops through areas studded with pill-boxes, some of them untouched by the bombardment and filled with highly combative Japanese, others mere chunks of shattered concrete made so by direct hits, still others damaged and smoldering from near misses.

Infantrymen, anxious to push on through this maze, followed a pattern—get up, stumble a few yards ahead, drop again. Everywhere shell crater conversations were much the same: "We're spotted—let's get the hell outa here."

This pattern, to be repeated against even heavier resistance, was one that 5th Division Marines would follow in many bitter days ahead. The Japanese still held Iwo Jima with about 23,000 troops—17,500 army and 5,500 navy. The backbone of the organization was the 2d Independent Mixed Brigade (six battalions of infantry) and the 145th Infantry Regiment, both with supporting artillery.

The Japanese supporting artillery and individual equipment were all that any commander could have asked for. The following is a list of what the Japanese actually had on the island, as nearly as intelligence teams could determine it after the battle:

- 12 320mm spigot mortars
- 22 150mm trench mortars
- 4 15cm coast defense guns
- 4 14cm coast defense guns

- 9 12cm coast defense guns
- 12 12cm short coast defense guns
- 30 12cm dual-purpose guns
- 6 10cm dual-purpose guns
- 5 8cm dual-purpose guns
- 18 7.5cm dual-purpose guns
- 1 150mm howitzer
- 4 120mm howitzers
- 6 10cm howitzers
- 4 90mm howitzers
- 5 75mm pack howitzers
- 17 75mm field guns
- 24 70mm battalion guns
- 70 90/81mm mortars
- 380 50mm heavy grenade dischargers
- 54 47mm antitank guns
- 15 37mm antitank guns
- 4 40mm antiaircraft machine guns
- 213 25mm machine guns
- 9 23mm antiaircraft machine guns
- 4 20mm machine guns
- 168 13mm machine guns

In addition to these weapons, the Japanese had 350 heavy machine guns; 480 light machine guns; 30 tanks; 61 flamethrowers; 10,000 rifles; 12 searchlights; 3 radar units; and more than 200 rocket launchers.

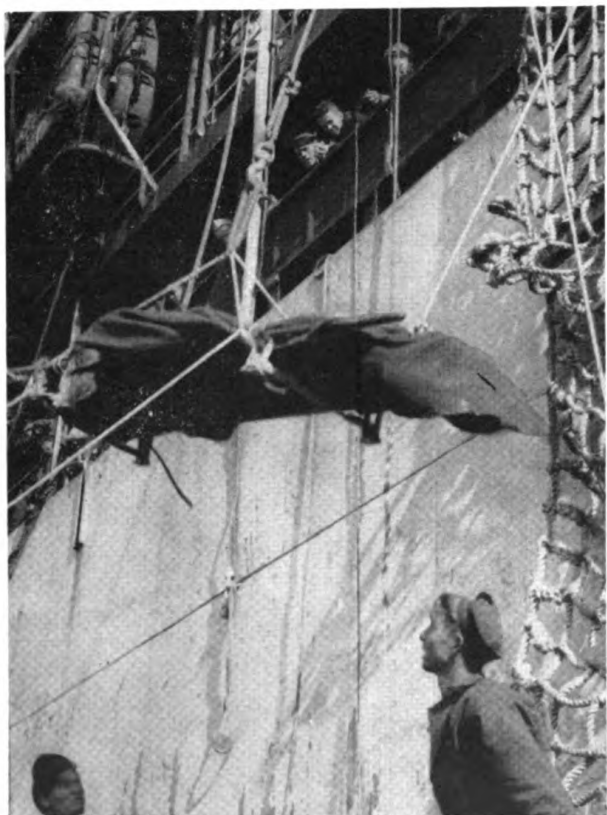

The price of the conquest of Iwo Jima was going to be high.

► HELP FOR THE INFANTRY

WHILE THE INFANTRY units were slugging across the island, regimental assistant operations officers stationed aboard control vessels were coordinating the landing of the supporting units and heavy weapons.

When big Japanese guns opened up on the only supply road leading inland from the Red beaches, it was soon filled with burning and blasted DUKWs, jeeps, and amtracs.

Winches were kept humming as wounded were hoisted aboard ship. The second day's casualties had run higher than D-day's, and beach conditions were still bad.

Company C, 5th Tank Battalion, had landed at 1145 with orders to mop up behind LT 1/28 and knock out enemy emplacements holding up the advance, but five of the tanks hit land mines buried in the terraces behind Green Beach 1. Their treads were shattered and they were out of action for the time being.

Half-tracks, although stopped near the water's edge, rammed their 75mm shells into pillboxes and caves. Rocket men attached to CT 28 lost three of their four launching trucks before they could fire a single rocket. The two 37mm platoons attached to LTs 1/28 and 2/28 succeeded in crossing the beach although one gun and its Weasel were lost debarking from an LCVF and another gun and Weasel were destroyed by mortar fire on the beach. These guns, too small to see much service in the European Theater, did splendid service on Iwo and many other Pacific islands.

When one 37mm gun commander was wounded, Private First Class Hillery E. Windham, an ammunition carrier, took command. Under a rain of fire, he directed the movement of the field pieces across the beach to a position two hundred yards inland. Windham fired into the slopes and base of Suribachi, giving strong support to the infantry in the area.

D-day casualties pile up on the beaches. Many were hit a second time as they lay helpless awaiting evacuation

At 1430 General Hermle landed with his ADC Group and a headquarters reconnaissance party, and set up an advanced Division command post. Hermle, the only general officer then ashore on Iwo, crossed the open area of Airfield No. 1 while it was being swept by enemy fire, visited front-line units, and obtained the necessary first-hand information needed to direct the attack.

Other supporting units had been plagued with trouble on the beach. At the water's edge amtracs, LCMs and LCVPs were hit, burned, broached, capsized, and otherwise mangled. The loose, black volcanic cinders slid past the churning tires of wheeled vehicles, miring them axle-deep; the steep terraces blocked egress from the beach and extensive minefields took a heavy toll. Debris piled up everywhere.

Wounded men were arriving on the beach by the dozen, where they were not much better off than they had been at the front. There was no cover to protect them and supplies of plasma and dressings ran low. The first two boats bringing in badly needed litters were blown out of the water. Casualties were being hit a second time as they lay helpless, under blankets, awaiting evacuation to ships.

Leathernecks salvage their equipment from broached and battered craft.

Navy Lieutenant Paul Bradley, the 28th Marines' chaplain, went from man to man talking to them and trying to quiet them. As he knelt beside one wounded Marine, a sniper's bullet entered the man's side. Father Bradley did not flinch and remained to administer last rites.

Glamour Gal, first Marine artillery piece to fire back on Iwo, soon was joined by sisters of her battery.

Elsewhere on the beach Pharmacist's Mate First Class Joseph P. Dolan treated twenty-five casualties in two hours, working under heavy fire until, blood-soaked and weary, he was hit and evacuated. Six days later he was back treating the wounded again.

Of the 185 LVTs of the 3d and 11th Amphibian Tractor Battalions which brought in the assault waves, 182 had reached the beach safely. After disembarking troops, these amtracs began their around-the-clock mission of hauling hot cargo and evacuating wounded—and sometimes giving the infantry a hand.

One LVT, carrying a load of flamethrower fuel, chugged up to the front lines facing Suribachi. Here it made contact with an infantry patrol and advanced with it, the crew apparently being under the delusion they were manning a tank. The patrol scattered when an enemy pillbox opened fire but the thin-skinned tractor fought back. Private First Class Edwin R. Randall and Platoon Sergeant Arthur E. Rossi opened up with the .30- and .50-caliber machine guns. Corporal Jay B. Shouse emptied his pistol at the pillbox while "noncombatant" Corporal Theodore Batko drove the vehicle. Randall was wounded when a grenade landed in the cargo compartment but kept firing. Finally the enemy activity in the pillbox ceased, whereupon infantrymen moved up and found eight dead Japanese inside. The bullet-ridden LVT moved on to deliver its flamethrower fuel.

In the later waves using LCVPs, troops hunched down and huddled together as they headed toward Iwo through a sea of deadly waterspouts. In one boat, however, there were a few faint attempts to smile. The coxswain had painted "Too Late to Worry," in big letters on the ramp.

Among the casualties at this time was Colonel Louis C. Plain, executive officer of CT 27. While in the front lines, he was hit in the arm but continued his inspection and made his report on conditions in the regimental area before being evacuated.

Artillery forward observers and reconnaissance parties had landed with the infantry battalion commanders only to find that tentative gun positions selected from maps aboard ship still were held by the enemy. Howitzers, therefore, remained afloat until early afternoon. When they did get ashore, the pre-loaded DUKWs carrying them could not buck the steep terraces and loose sand, and LVTs had to pull the loaded trucks over the crest. Inland, they unloaded in the midst of heavy mortar and machine-gun fire while many furiously working artillerymen used their helmets and whatever else they could lay hands on to dig gun pits.

Twenty minutes after the 3d Battalion, 13th Marines, had landed, front-line troops heard a sharp crack and a high-pitched whine as the first round of American artillery fire passed overhead and exploded on Suribachi. Glamour Gal—a 105 howitzer commanded by Sergeant Joseph L. Pipes—was in action.

By 1800 six batteries from three of the battalions were in firing position. The 1st Battalion, under Lieutenant Colonel Oldfield, operated in direct support of CT 27 while the 3d Battalion, commanded by

Lieutenant Colonel Waller, turned its guns south to help CT 28. The 2d Battalion, led by Major Carl W. Hjerpe, reinforced the 1st while the 4th Battalion, commanded by Major James F. Coady, was assigned to general support. (The 4th battalion landed after dark and was in position ready to fire at dawn.)

LT 1/26, which, with LT 3/28 had formed Division reserve, had come ashore under heavy fire at 1500. Attached to CT 27, it was used as regimental reserve and as a connecting link with the 28th. The rest of CT 26 later was released to the 5th Division from Corps reserve and was ashore by dusk. All main elements now were on Iwo Jima except for Division Headquarters which remained aboard the Cecil.

Back at Suribachi, Colonel Liversedge decided to move his lines closer to the base of the mountain. Enemy fire was increasing in intensity each hour and it was hoped that more ground could be gained before the full power of the Japanese was brought to bear. Late in the afternoon he ordered his landing teams into the attack.

From left to right, facing south, LT 2/28, LT 3/28 and LT 1/28 jumped off. The latter had a one-company front facing Suribachi and another "front" to its flank along the west coast. Despite a naval gunfire and air preparation, the attack stalled. Heavy resistance, the open terrain, and the disorganizing effects of rapid advance made early in the day combined to crush this attempt to push on.

At 1700 General Hermle issued "button up" orders and the troops began to dig in for the night. The entire Division line was in the open in full view of the Japanese. While CT 28 faced Suribachi, CT 27 had made its pivot and was deployed facing the north. LT 3/26, under Lieutenant Colonel Tom M. Trotti, tied in the 27th with the 4th Division on the east. The rest of CT 26 dug in the center of the Division's beachhead along with support and service group units.

0-1—the first objective line which cut the runway of Airfield No. 2—was to have been the stopping point for D-day operations, but when darkness came at 1825, it was still many yards and many lives ahead for both the 5th and 4th Divisions. Although reserve battalions had been committed to press the attack, the 4th Division, faced with equally murderous opposition, had been unable to extend its beachhead beyond initially established gains.

The Japanese defenders were hidden deep in countless emplacements, caves, and pillboxes, all of which were mutually supporting. Every yard of the Marine advance had been and would continue to be into the teeth of this defense-in-depth with its bands of interlocking fire. In eight hours the 5th Division suffered 904 casualties. Three hundred sixty-six enemy dead had been counted and a beachhead 1,000 yards deep and 1,500 yards wide had been seized.

After the heavy fighting during the day, commanders hoped that the hours of darkness could be used to rest their men, to reorganize, and to get casualties back across the beaches and aboard ship. Instead, the Japanese made several infiltration attempts and shelled the front lines and rear areas heavily.

Battleships, cruisers, and destroyers hurled hot steel back into enemy positions. All night long, ragged patches of naval gunfire and artillery splashed the darkness while the pasty light of illuminating shells cast ghost-like shadows over the newly won beachhead. Marines scurried from hole to hole carrying supplies and ammunition from the beaches to the front lines, where men who were facing the enemy for the first time behaved with steady courage, piling up bodies of Japanese infiltrators in front of their positions throughout the night.

During the early morning hours an enemy barge landed on the west coast and LT 1/28 killed thirty-nine Japanese attempting to come ashore. The strongest counterthreat came at 0230 when about five hundred enemy formed in front of CT 27. This counter-attack was dispersed with the effective aid of artillery fire from the 13th Marines.

It seemed that the Marines' grip on another piece of Japanese territory was secure although far from consolidated. American lines had moved 4,197 miles west of Pearl Harbor to stay.

An 81mm mortar crew bombards the enemy on Suribachi as troops ahead drive toward its base.

Suribachi

D-DAY HAD BEEN a wild scramble to cut off Iwo Jima's head, to separate Suribachi from the rest of the island at its narrow neck. This having been done, the problem remained of seizing the volcano with its honeycomb of defensive positions and artillery observation posts. Until Suribachi fell, Marines would have no peace from accurate and devastating fire; indeed, they would probably have blessed little peace from it in any case, but the capture of Suribachi might serve to make it a little less accurate. Therefore, to CT 28 went the job of seizing the mountain.

Meanwhile, the rest of the 5th Division would attack to the north, toward the airfields they had come after, toward the main Japanese defenses. Colonel Wornham's CT 27, with LT 1/26 still attached, fought its way forward on D plus 1 and seized the part of Motoyama Airfield No. 1 in its zone of action while the 4th Marine Division on its right (east) was overrunning the remainder. CT 26, minus its 1st Battalion, remained in Division reserve.

[Here this history, as well as the action it records, must be divided. This chapter will be devoted to the capture of Suribachi. The action of the rest of the Division during the period in which CT 28 operated more or less separately, will be picked up again in the following chapter.]

Colonel "Harry the Horse" Liversedge, CT 28's commander, had led Marine Raiders in some of the bitterest action in the South Pacific. As a master craftsman at his trade and a longtime foe of the Japanese, he knew what his men faced before Suribachi could be wiped off the books. Lieutenant Colonel Robert Williams, his exec, made it sound simple: "A frontal attack, surround the base, locate a route up, then climb it!"

It was not, as a matter of fact, much more complicated than that, but infinitely harder. The volcano still packed a deadly punch. Preliminary bombardment by air and naval forces had knocked out most of the coast-defense and dual-purpose guns emplaced around it and had driven the enemy deep into its bowels, but once this withering support fire ceased, the Japanese poured out of their underground caves and remanned hundreds of untouched concrete structures in a belt of shrubbery around the base and high up in the cliffs. Help came, too, from artillery and mortars in the north. Throughout their first night on the island sleepless Marines were pounded by a crossfire from both ends of it.

The D plus 1 attack against Suribachi began with LT 3/28 on the right, LT 2/28 on the left, and LT 1/28 in reserve. As the troops moved out it became painfully clear that this was going to be no repetition of the 800-yard advance of D-day. They were met by heavy, accurate fire from the vastly complex Japanese defensive system.

In addition, they faced a severe mental hazard, that of the mountain itself. On this day, and increasingly as days went by, Suribachi seemed to take on a life of its own, to be watching these men, looming over them, pressing down upon them. When they moved, they moved in its shadow, under its eye. To be sure, there were hundreds of eyes looking at them from the mountain, but these were the eyes of a known enemy, an enemy whose intent was perfectly clear. In the end, it is probable that the mountain represented to these Marines a thing more evil than the Japanese.

The men who fought against Suribachi did not fight alone, however. They had powerful help. Marine and Navy fighter planes made low-level attacks and diving turns against the sides of the volcano, bombing, strafing, rocketing, dropping Napalm until its steep sides appeared to burst into flame.

Destroyers, rocket gunboats, and artillery joined the attack with shattering force, but the shell-blast, destroying some emplacements, at the same time unmasked more and more concrete structures buried in the scrubby growth and rocky ground leading to the base of the mountain. Marines had to destroy each of those emplacements in order to move forward. All of them were mutually supporting and strongly manned.

Suribachi's caves were as formidable as its pillboxes and blockhouses. Like most enemy defenses, they had from two to five entrances with interconnecting tunnels, and had been used as air-raid shelters and living quarters. They were linked with magazine, supply, and command caves containing food, water, and ammunition, some of them burrowing fifty feet below ground with steps and air shafts leading to the lowest levels far down in the volcano. From cave entrances 6-inch guns, protected by five-foot walls of concrete, pointed down the island.

Only split-second teamwork by every unit in the combat team could gain ground against such fierce resistance. Infantry and tanks brought each pillbox under fire while a flamethrower team worked up to one of its entrances. After the position had taken several bursts of flame the rest of the assault squad closed in to finish the job with grenades. Engineers and demolition teams then blasted the positions to be sure that the Japanese could not profitably reoccupy them. Flame-throwing tanks helped out wherever the terrain allowed them to move into effective range.

But on an island where a man's life was likely to be forfeit simply because he was on it, teamwork alone was not enough to advance the lines. The conspicuous gallantry of many men furnished the spark that drove other men forward.

One such man was Corporal Norman D. Wood. He and his machine-gun platoon were attacked by a seven-man Japanese raiding party armed with a Nambu and grenades. Alone, Wood boldly charged into the enemy group, killing four and driving the rest back toward their own lines.

Private First Class Donald J. Ruhl, a rifleman in E Company, LT 2/28, alone attacked eight Japanese who had been driven from their blockhouse. He shot one and bayoneted another; the rest presumably escaped to fight again. The day after this exploit, Ruhl moved through a tattoo of machine-gun fire to rescue a wounded Marine who lay forty yards ahead of the lines, fully exposed to Japanese fire. Later, he volunteered to take over an enemy gun emplacement seventy-five yards ahead of the nearest friendly troops, staying there alone all one night to prevent the Japanese from recapturing it.

The next morning, Ruhl and a buddy crawled to the top of a Japanese bunker and were firing on enemy troops nearby when a grenade landed between them. Ruhl dived on it and smothered the blast, saving his companion's life at the cost of his own. He was posthumously awarded the Medal of Honor.

On the CP maps, CT 28's line moved almost imperceptibly toward Suribachi. Colonel Liversedge's Marines had taken from the Japs two hundred yards of ground, taken it with courage and with blood. Eight officers and 158 men had been killed or wounded—twenty per cent of the regiment's effective strength. There was, however, some consolation in the fact that LT 1/28 had been reorganized after its storming D-day assault across the island, and had spent the day mopping up by-passed pillboxes along the west beaches. But as D plus 1 had been, the night in some ways was worse.

Out of Suribachi came white and amber pyrotech-nic flares, one of which was probably for artillery and the other for mortar fire; this identification, however, was of only academic interest to the exhausted men below. A double dose of both whistled out of northern Iwo and battered their position.

American guns ashore and afloat answered this barrage, pounding the Japanese in the cliffs and in their positions around the lip of the crater. The USS Henry A. Wiley (DM 29) closed in to two hundred yards, trapped a group of counterattacking Japanese with its searchlight and opened up with every available gun on board, firing down the beam into a wooded area near the shore. Ashore, the 3d Battalion, 13th Marines, added their fire power to that of infantry mortars and pounded enemy positions through the night.

The next problem that faced CT 28's commander was how to speed the rate of advance from D plus 1's two hundred yards and at the same time cut his own losses. The answer was additional air strikes, artillery, and naval gunfire support, these being still room between CT 28's line and the base of Suribachi to use air support and the Navy's big guns.

"Ask for all of it, Pete," Colonel Liversedge told his operations officer, Major Oscar F. Peatross, "and tell those planes to drop it close—we can't use air tomorrow."

► ON TOWARD SURIBACHI

AS WARSHIPS and artillery ashore loosed a pre-attack bombardment on D plus 2, forty fighters and dive bombers roared in "on the deck" and strafed with rockets and machine-gun fire. Assault troops were showered with earth and debris as carrier planes swung in to within a hundred yards of the front-line marking panels.

The only hitch that developed was the inability of the tanks to rearm and refuel before the attack. No advances were made until they moved up. Later, with their fire power leading the way, troops methodically bored into clusters of pillboxes and blockhouses, and soon began to crack the main defenses in front of Suribachi.

An armored half-track platoon under Captain Jack H. Rhoades, which had been hammering enemy mortars from positions on the beach, moved up over an improvised road and began to knock out front-line obstacles and to fire into caves. Mortars, 37mm guns, and rocket detachments joined in pounding the Japanese positions.

The enemy, apparently fearing especially the heavy explosive blast of the rockets, zeroed in on the unarmored launching trucks. The crews, caught in this deluge of fire, retreated to cover and from there ran up singly to load the rocket platform. When the order to fire was given, one Marine would scamper forward, dive under the truck, then reach his arm around the side to push the firing button.

During the day Colonel Liversedge's CT methodically reduced each position blocking the advance, and by mid-afternoon had reached the base of Suribachi on both coasts.

The only sizable counterattack was delivered by 150 Japanese who, isolated from the saner advice of General Kuribayashi in the north, left their cover and charged LT 1/28's narrow sector along the west beaches. The few survivors were thrown back into the mountain.

The action on D plus 2 had cost CT 28 11 officers and 185 men dead or wounded, cutting combat efficiency to about three-quarters of full strength. Only five C Company tanks remained in operation although Lieutenant Howard L. Dalton and his maintenance platoon continued to work feverishly to repair those knocked out. Before the operation was over they had patched fifty-six Shermans. (On a percentage basis, every tank in the company was knocked out of the battle at least three times.)

Important, even essential, to the success of the infantry were Marines from C Company, 5th Engineer Battalion, under Lieutenant Kenneth L. Caskey. The usual tactic in pillbox warfare requires the engineers to mop up close on the heels of the riflemen, but many of these Marines took it upon themselves to move out ahead—to blast emplacements holding up the infantry.

Sergeant Harold G. Pierce was one of these. With demolitions tied around his waist and lashed to his back, he squirmed through the bullet-whipped space between Marine lines and the Japanese to blast pill-boxes barring the path of the harassed infantry. While riflemen covered him as best they could, Pierce single-handedly cleared a route for two companies struggling for a foothold at the base of Suribachi. Later that day he grabbed an automatic rifle and tried to destroy an enemy mortar position only to be cut down by a machine gun. Seriously wounded, Pierce crawled back to an aid station alone rather than take an able-bodied man out of the line.

Other men also fought in unlikely, or at least unorthodox, ways. Major John Gorman, a 5th Division air observer, was circling over Suribachi when he spotted several groups of Japanese emerging from caves and forming for a counterattack. Gorman first radioed this information to the high command aboard ship and then made a message drop to the command post of CT 28 giving them full details of the new threat. Then he and his pilot turned back to Suribachi and proceeded to bombard the Japanese with both explosive and smoke grenades until heavier weapons were brought to bear from the ground.

That night the Japanese again sent up flares from Suribachi. Now, however, their cohorts in the north, hard-pressed by the 4th Division and the remainder of the 5th, were able to send only sporadic mortar and artillery fire into the southern area. About midnight three enemy swimmers, attempting to come ashore on the west beaches, were killed.

► THE VISE CLOSES

CT 28 CONTINUED the attack on D plus 3, still with three landing teams abreast. By mid-morning LT 2 28 on the left and LT 1/28 on the right were moving around the base of the volcano, while demolition and flame-thrower teams moved with them and continued to turn enemy fortifications into charred rubble. Unfortunately, close-in fighting and narrow corridors made effective use of tanks and artillery impossible, leaving riflemen and machine gunners to deal with the well dug-in Japs as best they could—and their best was very good indeed. Corporal Daniel R. McCarthy alone killed twenty Japanese with his machine gun.

Operations throughout the day were hampered by bad weather and poor visibility. A hard, soaking rain came down to mix the volcanic dust into a glue-like mess that fouled up automatic weapons to the point where Marines had to fire them single-shot. Even so, it was apparent that the defenders of Suribachi were beginning to crack. During the day a language officer took a loud speaker into the front lines and urged the Japanese to surrender. Shortly afterward the men below could see several of Suribachi's defenders leap to their deaths from the crater's lip.

Devil's breath on Hell's island. Spearhead Marines turn their flamethrowers on a Japanese pillbox at the base of Iwo's Mount Suribachi.

As the advance continued, NCOs were taking over everywhere from wounded officers. Sergeant Merritt M. Savage reorganized one platoon from a badly mauled, casualty-ridden company and led it against the enemy, himself killing seven Japanese with his pistol and hand grenades.

This was the sort of battle that brought out the best a man had in him, kept him fighting as long as he could, sometimes even longer. A few minutes after a Corpsman had dug a chunk of metal out of his back, First Sergeant Edward M. Swain was back in action; a captain, wounded in the head, continued to direct tank fire against enemy caves and pillboxes. And there were others, men who had so keyed themselves up, had so dissociated mind from body that they could drive themselves beyond their normal limits of endurance.

Some men performed fantastic feats. One Marine, charging a pillbox, was met by a saber-swinging Japanese lieutenant. This Leatherneck grabbed the sword with his bare hands, then cut off the officer's head with it. Another Marine stormed a blockhouse and killed ten Japs inside before he died. Elsewhere on the front, two squads of riflemen isolated by enemy fire ahead of the front lines, fought their way back and dragged eight casualties with them. Corpsmen moved up to the very muzzles of enemy guns to get the wounded. Out of about one hundred attached to CT 28, thirty soon were casualties. One battalion alone lost thirteen Corpsmen at a time when they could least be spared.

Two seriously wounded Marines, one breathing through a tube in his neck, lay helpless for more than twenty-four hours on the far side of Suribachi. When rescue by land failed, four Marines, led by Staff Sergeant Charles E. Harris, paddled a rubber life raft through the rocky surf and picked them out from under the noses of the enemy.

By late afternoon on D plus 3, the 28th Marines had surrounded Suribachi except for four hundred yards on the west coast, and, although the casualty rate dropped for the first time, had lost 5 officers and 101 men in the process, many of them key personnel. A mortar shell landing in the command post had cut down Lieutenant Commander Daniel McCarthy, the regimental surgeon, and several other irreplaceable specialists.

Rain, mortar fire, and infiltrating Japs all kept the tired, drenched Marines on edge throughout the night, as Colonel Liversedge and his staff planned for the final knockout blow against Suribachi.

"At dawn," the Colonel said, "we start climbing."

► THE FALL OF SURIBACHI

EARLY ON D PLUS 4 four men from LT 2/28's F Company started to scale the gutted slopes of Suribachi. The patrol leader, Sergeant Sherman Watson, kept reporting as he went along that the Japanese still were holed up. Lieutenant Colonel Johnson, the battalion CO, made his decision. He threw together a forty-man combat patrol—remnants of the 3d Platoon of E Company, and a handful of men from battalion headquarters, and put in command Lieutenant Harold G. Schrier, the E Company executive officer.

"If you reach the top," Johnson told him, "secure and hold it. And take this along." "This" was an American flag which Lieutenant George G. Wells, the battalion adjutant, had brought ashore in his map case from the transport Missoula.

The patrol filed through reeking battle debris and blasted gunpits and started up the northern face of Suribachi, sometimes walking, sometimes crawling on hands and knees as the slope became steeper. Higher and higher the patrol picked its way, avoiding heavily mined trails and keeping men out on the flanks to protect the main body from ambush.

"Those guys," observed a Marine below, "ought to be getting flight pay."

As the men neared the top they spread out around the rim of the crater. Schrier signalled. The patrol charged over the top and met—nothing, nothing but a deep, yawning lava pit.

Suribachi had fallen!

One Marine ran up with a piece of hollow pipe. On it went the flag. At 1035, while Sergeant Louis Lowery, a Leatherneck Magazine photographer, photographed the event, Lieutenant Schrier, Platoon Sergeant Ernest I. Thomas, Sergeant Henry Hanson, Corporal Charles W. Lindberg, and Private First Class James Michaels raised the colors.

Hovering over a nearby cave, little 16-year-old Private First Class James Robeson refused to be included in the picture. "Hollywood Marines," he snorted, and watched intently for a crack at anyone who might object to the flag-raising.

Several did. An enraged Japanese soldier hiding nearby pitched a grenade at the flag party and another charged, brandishing a Samurai sword. Both died quickly.

On the beachhead below, thousands of Marines saw the tiny flag, but for every cheer that went up, a hundred got only as far as a tight, lumpy throat. Most

(6) While thousands of Marines on the beachhead below thrilled at the sight of the Stars and Stripes flying over Mount Suribachi, the patrol atop the volcano engaged in a pitched battle with the enemy.

Marines simply stood silently watching the volcano, and they went on about whatever they had been doing. (Four hours later, when the original flag was replaced with a larger one, Joe Rosenthal of the Associated Press shot the scene without realizing he had just taken the most celebrated picture of World War II.¹)

The flag was on Suribachi to stay; no one doubted that. Neither did anyone doubt that there was hard fighting still ahead—the volcano was still crawling with Japs. Schrier walked over to the men whose picture had just been taken.

"We haven't time to waste around here," he said, "let's get back to work."

Even as Schrier made the remark one company below was battling more than two hundred Japanese in a honeycomb of caves partly hidden by the tangled underbrush. Trying to get the stalled attack under way, Private First Class Harold E. Benedict grabbed the only flamethrower left in the company and began scorching the cave openings. The enemy instantly concentrated their fire on him, but he continued to douse them with bursts of flame for five hours without receiving a scratch to show for the intense fire he had been under.

At 1130 elements of LT 1/28 met patrols of LT 2/28 on the southern tip of the island. CT 28's objective was reported taken except for mopping up. Generals Smith and Rockey and Admiral Turner sent their congratulations.

Engineers and infantrymen spent the rest of D plus 4 blowing and sealing caves. The next day over a hundred Japanese were killed as mopping up continued, many of them trapped as they tried to filter through the lines with demolitions tied to their bodies, apparently heading for Marine artillery.

During one pre-dawn breakthrough, the LT 1/28 CP and aid station were assaulted by thirty grenade-throwing Japanese. Battalion headquarters personnel, including Corpsmen, grabbed weapons and killed the attackers, successfully protecting their patients who lay on stretchers in the midst of the fight.

Taking Suribachi had cost CT 28 904 casualties. (Coincidentally, this was the exact number of casualties for the entire 5th Division on D-day.) Of these, 7 officers and 202 men had been killed. On the other side, 1,231 enemy dead had been counted, hundreds more were sealed inside caves and blockhouses, and more than a thousand enemy emplacements of all kinds had been destroyed.

Working with the infantry, engineers had destroyed 165 concrete pillboxes and blockhouses—some with walls ten feet thick—had blasted 15 strong bunkers and naval-gun positions; had destroyed thousands of shells, grenades, and land mines; and had sealed 200 caves, some of them three stories high with heavy steel doors. In addition, these supporting troops evacuated hundreds of wounded Marines and bulldozed 1,500 yards of roads and tank paths around the crater.

Corps took control of CT 28 on D plus 6. Colonel Liversedge's men remained in reserve in the Suribachi area for five days picking off Japanese who dug themselves out of caves, salvaging arms and equipment, and training new replacements.

Intelligence observers and artillery spotters (including the "flash-bang" counter-battery observers) soon turned the volcano into a vital observation post. This 554-foot OP overlooked all of southern and central Iwo and proved extremely advantageous to the landing force and correspondingly hurtful to the Japanese who now were denied its use.

Marines atop Suribachi, looking to the north, could see the flash and dust of battle. Few realized what it held for them.

Attack to the North

WHEN CT 28 TURNED SOUTH to attack Mt. Suribachi the rest of the 5th Marine Division pivoted to the north with its left flank on the western shore of the island, on its right the 4th Division. The Japanese opposed this advance from strongly manned pillboxes, blockhouses, and caves around the two airfields, supported by heavy and effective artillery and mortar fire from the far north—effective because of the splendid observation the Japanese had over the entire Division zone of action.

CT 27, with LT 1/26 attached, attacked with two battalions abreast, LT 3/27 on the right and LT 1/26 on the left, both with armor from the 5th Tank Battalion attached. Infantry and armor moving together overran that part of Airfield No. 1 within the 5th's zone and netted a gain of eight hundred yards during the day.

That morning Lieutenant Colonel Daniel Pollock's 1st Battalion had followed its tanks into the open on the low ground along the wide western beaches and had been hit immediately by artillery, mortar, and small-arms fire, plus a heavy concentration of air-burst from Japanese antiaircraft guns fired at their minimum angle of elevation.

A key terrain feature commanding the western beaches was a steep, cave-pocked cliff out of which poured a stream of fire. Toward it Captain Robert H. Dunlap led his C Company, LT 1/26, but his attack faltered in the face of the accurate fire. Whereupon Dunlap crawled two hundred yards forward of his company's line, located the enemy guns, returned briefly to relay the information to artillery and naval gunfire units and immediately took off again to an exposed vantage point from which he directed a smashing bombardment against the cliffs. His men, helped as much by his example as by the bombardment, overran the defenses and pushed on. Dunlap was later awarded the Medal of Honor.

Another Marine from the same battalion won the Medal of Honor that day. Four men from LT 1/26 were ambushed as they crept through a treacherous, twisting ravine, and were attacked savagely with rifle fire and hand grenades. When two grenades landed directly in front of the group, Private First Class Jacklyn H. Lucas hurled himself over his comrades onto one grenade and pulled the other under him, absorbing the full blast of both explosions. Miraculously, he lived, and five months later received the Medal of Honor from President Truman at the White House.

One platoon of A Company tanks under Lieutenant John J. Stemkoski made what was probably the deepest penetration of the day—a thousand yards to the upper beach area near a deep sulphur blowhole something like a miniature volcano. Here the tanks silenced clusters of enemy machine guns, destroyed an ammunition dump, and generally shot up the Japanese.

The troops found extensive, well planned dummy positions in this sector. Positions which had appeared to be formidable pillboxes on aerial photos turned out to be heaped-up sand mounds with fire ports fashioned from wooden boxes. Dummy tanks were made out of wood and one tank, found later, was carved from soft stone. These fake emplacements and weapons had served their purpose; during the pre-invasion barrage they had drawn heavy fire. On the right, in front of Airfield No. 1, LT 3/27 under Lieutenant Colonel Donn J. Robertson ran into more determined resistance, butting head-on into many of the 135 pillboxes and heavy-gun emplacements which ringed the high-banked airstrip. The Japanese in this area kept up deadly small-arms fire while their heavy guns in the north pounded the green waves of advancing Marines and their supporting tanks.

The 5th Tank Battalion, with 31 of its 50 tanks in operation, stayed in front of the infantry and brought its superior fire power to bear on the Japanese, but it also received special attention from them. One Jap got close enough to the tank commanded by Lieutenant William O. Jarvis to toss a satchel charge under it and set it afire. The crew fought clear and killed six howling Japanese who swarmed around them. By such tactics and such heroism were the Marines able to seize Airfield No. 1, one of the prizes they had come after. So small was the island, however, that the airfield would not be secure until the last Japanese on Iwo had been accounted for.

The sea would have been bad enough, but the enemy around Suribachi, supported by artillery in the north of the island, were giving the beaches an unmerciful pounding. Beaches Green 1 and Red 2, and

► "HOT" BEACH

AS THE ASSAULT TROOPS moved inland, bad weather moved into the Iwo Jima area, the first evidence of it (apparent on D plus 1) being the steadily rising surf. Foaming swells spilled higher and higher up the black beaches and support ships and transports began to roll in a sea of white caps. Broached and shattered landing craft, shell-torn amtracs, and bogged-down vehicles along the debris-littered landing area were gradually sucked into the sand and swallowed whole despite the efforts of bulldozers to extricate the 4th Division's Yellow and Blue Beaches were too hot for men to work on continuously, but Beach Red 1, in the center of the 5th Division landing area, received lighter fire and the bulk of supplies and equipment was funneled across it.

Colonel Gally's two shore-party battalions (5th Pioneer and 31st CB) were raked by artillery, mortar and small-arms fire as they worked desperately to clear the beaches and to unload incoming landing craft. They stacked supplies landed by LCVPs and LCMs well above the high-water mark, but gear piled up there faster than it could be moved inland and there were twenty tasks for each heavy tractor.

To meet this crisis the entire logistical plan of establishing shore-party dumps was abandoned. Without pausing on the beaches, incoming amtracs—the only vehicles that could climb the terraces and reach firm ground unassisted—waddled up the slopes into the front lines where they delivered ammunition, rations, and water directly to fighting units. Tractors tugged bogged-down weapons and vehicles free and hauled supply-carrying DUKWs over the terraces where they, too, made front-line deliveries. Makeshift inland routes up the steep slopes soon became clogged with burning and shell-riddled LVTs and DUKWs whose drivers had tried to run the gantlet—and failed.

One DUKW from the 471st Amphibian Truck Company (Army) was floundering up the slopes toward the lines when a Japanese artillery shell ripped it open and set its cargo of ammunition to blazing furiously. An explosion was imminent—an explosion which would wreck the troop installations clustered thickly in the area, among them the 5th Tank Battalion's CP. The heroic crew, along with Marines in the area, swarmed over the blazing truck and tossed out critically needed howitzer shells until the fire was completely out of control. Then, although every man in the area was ordered back to safety, the Negro driver (whose name no one learned) jumped into the DUKW, drove it off the road into a cleared area and leaped to safety. Seconds later the blazing vehicle exploded.

In addition to the vehicles moving back and forth from the lines, Marine working parties hand-carried ammunition from the beaches to the lines, desperately trying to relieve local shortages that had now become critical.

To further complicate matters, it now became apparent to Generals Smith and Schmidt that the 3d Marine Division, still afloat, would sooner or later have to be used. Furnishing food and ammunition to an additional twenty thousand fighting men would require all usable beach facilities and made doubly necessary the job of clearing the landing area. The job was done by shore-party personnel working steadily for three days and nights under fire.

Near the water's edge, where the battalions of the 13th Marines were supporting the D plus 1 attack, the 1st Battalion fired a thirty-minute barrage for CT 27's K-hour jump-off and was promptly hit by counterbattery fire that shattered two howitzers, set fire to three hundred rounds of ammunition, and forced B Battery temporarily to abandon its position. This battalion, nevertheless, fired four thousand shells into enemy lines during its first twenty-four hours ashore.

Heavy shelling of the entire beachhead and sniper activity in the rear areas made it difficult for commanders and staffs to direct and coordinate the attack. Radio-battery shortages developed in assault units, and heavy fire—plus heavy vehicular traffic—chewed telephone lines to bits. Without reliable communication it was impossible to issue orders, get reports, or keep a clear picture of operations.

Marines developed highly unorthodox ways of beating this difficulty. Corporal John Haddox, for instance, crawled into an abandoned Weasel, and, although he had never operated one before, drove through a heavy artillery barrage to the beach. There he loaded his machine with radio batteries and other critically needed signal equipment and took off for the front where he dumped the load, turned around, and returned to the beach. Haddox made the trip twelve times under fire before he collapsed from exhaustion.

Additional men and equipment from the Signal, Military Police, Reconnaissance, and Headquarters Companies had been landed to reinforce General Hermle's advance Division command post set up near the airfield embankment. General Hermle took stock of the situation and again urged General Rockey to remain aboard the Cecil with his staff until D plus 2. Aboard ship, Division headquarters could control and supply the fighting units; ashore they could do little but dodge shells.

When night fell on D plus 1, Marines on Iwo Jima were anchored more securely even though casualties to the entire landing force had run higher than on D-day and beach conditions were bad. Both the 4th and 5th Divisions were holding what they had gained, although some units had to make local adjustments. LT 1/26 was forced to drop back two hundred yards on the extreme left flank to secure favorable ground for night defense, and LT 3/27 had to edge over two hundred yards into the 4th Division zone to establish contact with the 4th's Combat Team 23. (The 5th's brother division had gained four hundred yards under heavy fire up the right side of Iwo.)

Marines now controlled nearly one-third of the island's eight square miles and had a two-mile-wide beachhead extending along the landing area and for two thousand yards up the southwest coast. Motoyama Airfield No. 1 was completely in American hands, lines were well-knit and many more artillery pieces and serviceable tanks were available for support. Warships close offshore continued to pound strongpoints from which the Japanese sprayed the newly won beachhead.

The enemy, however, was not impressed. There was no let-up in the heavy-weapons barrage, and Japanese soldiers infiltrated all along the line. Not many of them lived long enough to do any serious damage, although several Marines were stabbed by Japanese who jumped into their foxholes. The only serious threat—an enemy group massing to hit CT 27—was nipped by the 13th Marines and attached Corps artillery (155mm howitzers) whose heavy fire killed great numbers of Japanese and dispersed the rest of the force.

► D PLUS 2

TWELVE DESTROYERS, two cruisers, sixty-eight planes, and thirty-three howitzers battered the Japanese-held positions of the island before troops resumed the attack on D plus 2. In spite of this heavy preparation CT 27 met immediate and violent resistance from the enemy's main defensive positions—a belt of caves and concrete-and-steel emplacements a mile and a half deep and extending entirely across the island. It was later estimated that there were about 1,500 caves in the position in addition to all the pillboxes.

However, with tanks moving just ahead of the infantry, CT 27 had penetrated between nine hundred and a thousand yards into the defenses by early afternoon. At this point (just south of the 0-1 Line) the roof fell in. Enemy mortar and artillery fire became so intense that nothing could move forward, not even the tanks. Too, the advance had opened a sizeable gap between CT 27's right flank and the 4th Division, which had inched forward against bitter opposition for a hundred to 250 yards. To plug the gap Lieutenant Colonel Butler moved his LT 1/27 into position and extended the 5th's lines four hundred yards into CT 23's zone.

The day's gains had been made by LT 1/26 on the left (followed at four hundred yards by LT 2/27) and by LT 3/27 on the right.

Lieutenant Colonel Collins' 5th Tank Battalion, active in the attack, still was able to refuel, rearm, service its tanks and retrieve its cripples during static periods. A tankman's life was not, however, a bed of roses. Difficult terrain, bomb craters, soft sand, and mines slowed down the big vehicles. Crews had trouble finding the front lines and the units which had asked for support, and, when they did find them, were not always welcomed with opened arms—tanks drew mortar fire, and mortar fire caused heavy infantry losses. The tankers themselves discovered, too, that a heavy mortar shell could rip even the big Shermans wide open.

In the command picture, General Rockey and his Division Headquarters had left the Cecil at 1330 and come ashore, where they consolidated with General Hermle's ADC command post. That evening CT 26 moved north from its reserve position and prepared to relieve the 27th Marines.

Thirty-seven officers and 534 men had been killed or wounded during the third day's fighting, raising the Division total to more than two thousand. Casualties throughout the entire landing force during the first fifty-eight hours ashore exceeded 5,300. (Tarawa's figure was just over 3,000 for seventy-two hours.)

At dusk the enemy launched his strongest air attack of the campaign (there were eleven "red" alerts) against ships at Iwo Jima. About fifty Bettys and Zekes, coming in from all directions, hit the fleet and caused heavy damage. Four Kamikaze planes plunged into the carrier Saratoga during the three-hour attack, and Marines ashore could see the flashes of explosions as the badly damaged "Sara" limped out to sea.

Antiaircraft guns threw an umbrella of fire over the beachhead as enemy planes approached the island. Marines huddled in their holes, straining to hear the warning scream of falling bombs—a warning that never came as Japanese pilots turned back and set their sights on the outer ring of American warships. The Bismarck Sea, Lunga Point, Keokuk, and LST 477 all were bombed by Japanese aircraft. The Bismarck Sea was set afire and sunk (347 men and all its planes were lost).

The Japanese, taking advantage of the commotion, counterattacked along the 5th's entire northern front for six hours. In spite of almost constant illumination by parachute flares and heavy artillery fire LT 1/27, on the left (western) flank, was hit and hit hard by an estimated eight hundred Japanese who were turned back only after the fight had come to close quarters. Even so, many enemy troops filtered into the rear areas and had to be mopped up at first light on D plus 3.

The Drive for 0-2

D PLUS 3 WAS, if possible, more miserable than the three days which preceded it. A cold, heavy rain pelted the island, coating Marines and their weapons alike—already grimed with volcanic ash—with a sort of greyish paste. D plus 3 was also a morning of change in troop dispositions. Colonel Graham's CT 26, with LT 2/27 attached, passed through CT 27 and continued the attack to the northeast, following the western contour of the island. On its right CT 21, of the 3d Marine Division, wedged into the line between the 5th and 4th Divisions, this being permitted by the widening of the island.

The 5th Division zone of action lay between the terrace fringing the western beaches and a hundred-foot-high, almost sheer bluff, which ran northeast-southwest down the west center of the island and curved west across the 5th Division's front near Airfield No. 2. The high land above the bluff gave the Japanese perfect observation into the Division zone and allowed them to oppose any advance from both the front and right flank.

In spite of the difficulty of the situation, CT 26's initial attack carried forward for four hundred yards, but the 3d Division's attack along the bluff itself stalled, leaving the 5th Division troops in an untenable position. They were being hammered by fire from the front, right flank, and right rear and were finally forced to withdraw to an area around their original line of departure.

Even though it was apparent that the seizure of the high ground was the key to the situation, Corps headquarters continued to order the 5th Division to attack on succeeding days in the hope that flanking fire from its units might help the 3d Division to advance and crack the stalemate permanently. Such was not to be the case, however, not for some time.

In the meantime, CT 26 was taking severe casualties and, as usual, key men seemed to be hardest hit.

Lieutenant Colonel Trotti, commanding LT 3/26, and his executive officer, Major Day, were killed by a mortar shell. Colonel Lester S. Hamel, the regimental executive officer, took over the unit, reorganized it, and turned it over to Major Richard Fagan, relieved as Division Inspector to take command.

On the far left of the Division sector, LT 2/27 was holding doggedly to its position just short of the 0-1 line, near Iwo's large sulphur blowhole, in spite of one of the heaviest artillery and mortar concentrations of the campaign. All Major Antonelli's men could do was hug the ground and pray. To move was to be killed or wounded.

The Major had moved his command post into a clump of bushes near the blowhole to keep better contact with his companies, but all he got for his trouble was a two-hour concentration of observed fire heavy enough to bury men in their foxholes by concussion alone.

The entire Division front was now well within the enemy's main line of resistance, a net of defenses so tightly woven as to prohibit any maneuver and restrict the fighting to costly frontal assault, assault as bloody as any in Marine Corps history.

General Kuribayashi's reaction to the battle was reported later by a Japanese major who was taken prisoner on Chichi Jima at the end of the war. Messages from the Iwo garrison to Imperial Headquarters in Tokyo had passed through his hands.

"General Kuribayashi," he wrote, "was usually in his cave. . . . He was very skillful in making compositions, so his telegrams let all Japanese weep in those days."

"I am not afraid of the fighting power of only three American Marine divisions," the General radioed to Tokyo, "if there are no bombardments from aircraft and warships. This is the only reason why we have to see such miserable situations."

Top: Marines peer into a Japanese pillbox smashed by pre-invasion bombardment. Bottom: A shattered enemy pillbox. Marines faced hundreds like them.

Whether Kuribayashi had so grossly underestimated the caliber of his opponents as his message would indicate or whether he was writing for home consumption is difficult to say, but it seems unlikely that the man who had planned Iwo's magnificent defensive layout would take an unrealistic view of the strength needed to breach it—strength that he must have known was on hand.

Back on the beaches, back in the areas inland cleared of Japanese, necessary work was going on. On D plus 3 the site for the 5th Division cemetery was selected, and the Marines and sailors assigned to bury the dead began their task although even they were forced to work under fire and to clear mines.

Shore parties, trying to keep up with the demand for supplies brought on by the rain and by the bitter action at the front, were near exhaustion. Even though plans for Division dumps had not been abandoned, the requirements of the combat teams made it necessary for beach units to continue to deliver supplies direct to the front, work they had not enough manpower to do, but did anyhow.

The casualty situation was also threatening to get out of hand. Fewer and fewer small boats were reaching the beaches through the heavy surf, which meant that fewer and fewer casualties were reaching hospital ships. This might not have been critical, but rain, cold, and darkness were making evacuation stations nearly inoperative. Finally, LST 807, converted into a hospital ship for the operation, came in through the surf and beached. All during the night of D plus 3 doctors operated in the wardroom and the crew turned to to care for the wounded. Of the two hundred casualties treated aboard the ship, only two died.

► TROUBLE

THE NEXT DAY, D plus 4, saw another abortive attack to seize the O-2 Line, including Airfield No. 2. Elements of CT 26 hacked out gains of two hundred yards, but again had to pull back to the line of departure when CT 21 of the 3d Division was unable to move down the bluff. In the fighting Lieutenant Colonel Joseph P. Sayers, commanding LT 2/26, was wounded and evacuated and Major Amadeo Rea, his executive, took over the battalion.

The supply situation was becoming more difficult hourly. Critical shortages in demolitions and mortar ammunition developed; even though enemy fire on the beaches had slackened, the flow of supplies to the front diminished as men who had worked since D-day almost without rest found themselves unable to keep up the pace. The 3d and 11th Amphibian Tractor Battalions, ferrying supplies to the beach, were running short of vehicles. The 3d had lost 26 amtracs: 18 sunk in the surf, 4 swamped on the beach, 1 blown up by a mine and 3 hit by shells. In spite of their losses the 11th and 3d between them had brought in about 1,300 tons of supplies by D plus 2 and were still working.

One crew achieved the doubtful honor of being the first to test an amtrac on an ocean cruise. Corporal Bruno C. Laurenti, Private First Class William F.

Seward, and Private First Class Alex J. Herbert had taken their LVT out from the beach for a load of supplies, but their LST, its commander afraid to lower the ramp in rough water, refused to take them aboard. They were ordered to proceed to another LST, but it, too, would have no truck with them and ordered them back to shore. Before they reached shore, however, they ran out of gas and began to drift helplessly out to sea in the strong, off-shore current.

Finally, forty-eight hours later, a destroyer spotted them thirty-five miles east of Iwo and towed them back to their LST. Just as the men climbed aboard the mother ship their amtrac quietly sank.

► THRUST TOWARD AIRFIELD NO. 2

THE 5TH DIVISION'S ATTACK and, to all intents and purposes, the Corps attack, had now been stalled completely for two days. Finally the Corps commander decided to mass all his available shock weapons in one sector and try to achieve a breakthrough. On D plus 5 the tanks of all three divisions were massed under the 5th Division tank commander, Lieutenant Colonel Collins, and thrown against the strong enemy positions just north of Airfield No. 1.

Before the tanks moved out, all the supporting weapons available to Corps—artillery, air, naval gunfire, and rockets—were turned loose in a smashing barrage that churned the area into a mass of smoke, dust, and flying debris. The tanks moved out behind this fire and, although they hit mines and rough terrain, finally forced a passage along the taxi strip between Airfields 1 and 2, along the edge of the bluff.

The advance was made only at heavy cost, however. The tanks had just moved out when the lead vehicle, commanded by Lieutenant Henry H. Morgan, struck a mine and was put out of action. (Morgan had achieved some measure of fame for sending the shortest message of the operation back to battalion headquarters. On D-day he had started for the beach in his original tank, nicknamed Horrible Hank, but it had foundered and sunk in the surf. Reporting the incident, the Lieutenant radioed, "Horrible Hank sank.") With Morgan's third tank blown out from under him, Lieutenant Obert C. Richardson took the head of the column and promptly struck a buried aerial torpedo that blew out the tank's engine, sheared off the turret and hurled it fifty feet. The entire crew was killed except for one Marine who was blown clear. This man, Private First Class Dale W. Plummer, lay in the open under fire until Private First Class John Currie emerged from another tank and pulled him to safety.

Heavy antitank fire and mines continued to harass and disable the armored spearhead. Company A lost six out of ten tanks and made no advance, but other units kept chewing away at the heavily defended area and by early afternoon had spearheaded CT 21's advance as far as the southern edge of Airfield No. 2's east-west runway, an advance that pulled them abreast of CT 26 and erased the enemy's deep bulge into Marine lines.

As soon as CT 21 had to some extent consolidated its gains another barrage came down as all the Marine artillery on Iwo Jima massed fire on the same targets while planes, rocket-launching units, and warships added their power to the preparation. Under this cover CT 26 hacked out a 500-yard advance, but paid dearly for it as 21 officers and 332 men were killed or wounded during the day's fighting. Marines carrying special equipment were prime targets, especially men carrying flamethrowers or radios with antennas raised.

As Colonel Graham's 2d and 3d Battalions pushed ahead, LT 2/27, still on the left flank, moved into the broken, rocky ground north of the western beaches, making good headway until the lead elements came to a sandy, open valley dotted with grass-covered pillboxes and blockhouses. Captain Donald H. O'Rourke, commanding F Company, was hit at this point, but his Marines charged across two hundred yards of open ground—straight into a trap.

Within minutes forty men from the company had been hit as the Japanese saturated the barren ground with fire from machine guns, pillboxes, and tanks dug down to hull defilade. Company E, led by Major John

E. Salmon, joined the attack and immediately lost sixteen men in a mortar barrage. Finally Sergeant Jack Graham and four other men led up a platoon of tanks which blasted through to the far side of the valley, allowing the infantry to withdraw to more tenable positions. The battered men brought what casualties they could with them on improvised poncho litters, but stretcher bearers worked until 2200 that night to clear the area of dead and wounded.

Back on the beaches the supply situation had eased enough to permit the establishment of division dumps and the 5th Division quartermaster, Lieutenant Colonel Samuel F. Zeiler, relieved the shore party of supply distribution. The Corps shore party took command of all beaches, provided three beach companies to the Division to tally cargo, and began to furnish tractors, bulldozers, cranes, and motor transport. The Division quartermaster section received an ammunition company and a dump company, and a depot company was ordered to the Division cemetery. In an effort to eliminate unsatisfactory unloading ships' platoons were provided for LSTs, LSMs, and LCTs.

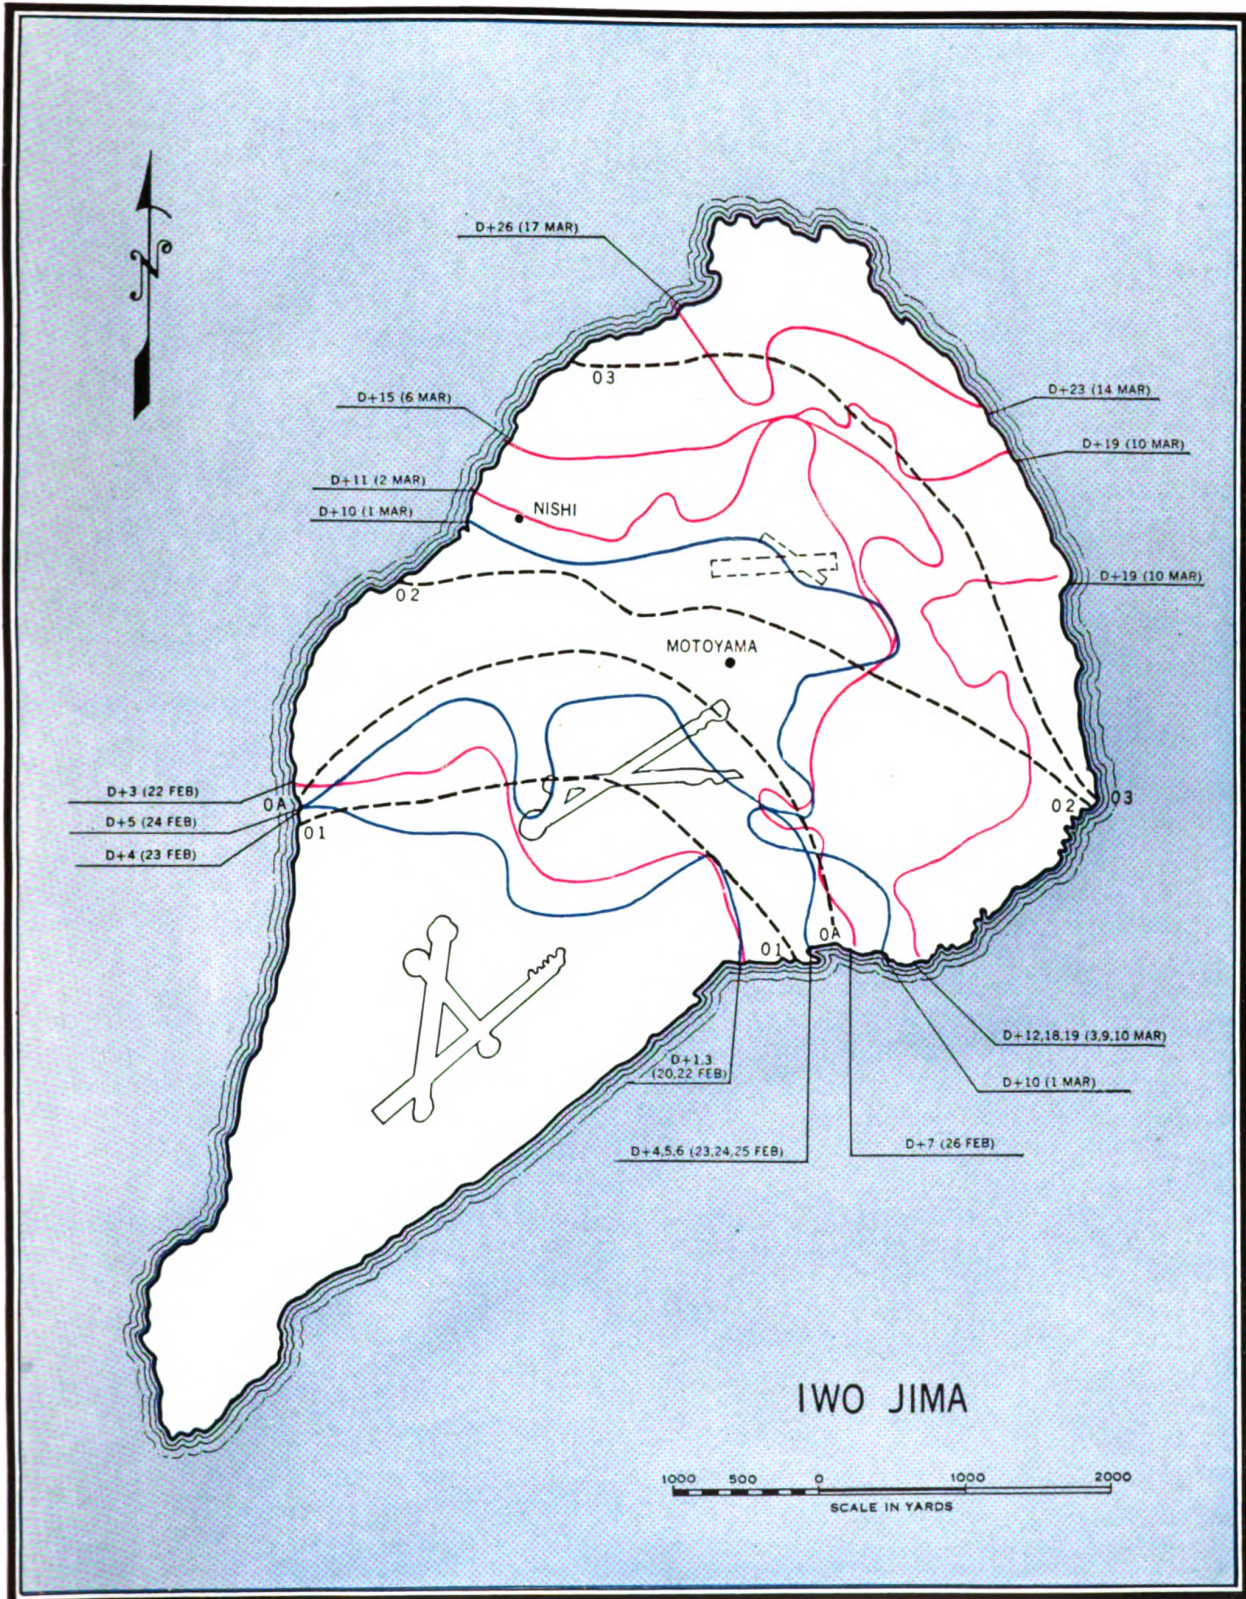

The capture of Suribachi stopped a great deal of the fire on Green Beach and as the front lines moved north the fire on other beaches gradually died down and stopped. A few LCMs came into the beach between D plus 4 and D plus 6, but surf conditions were still so bad that cargo unloading was almost impossible except from the much larger LSMs and LSTs. Ashore, however, a web of roads began to spread across the island and steel traction matting covered the exits inland from the beach. The critical phase of the supply operation was over.

Corps headquarters and Major General Erskine's 3d Division headquarters were both set up ashore on D plus 5, and the 3d Division got ready to take over the entire center of the Corps line between the 4th and 5th Divisions.

► REORGANIZATION AND MAINTENANCE

EVERY 5TH DIVISION advance or attempt to advance in the last three days had been met by heavy fire from the bluff line on its right, and Corps now decided that the 5th Division would not attack for the O-2 Line again until the 3d Division had seized ground well ahead of the 5th's right battalion. On D plus 6, even though the 3d Division's CT 9 gained nearly four hundred yards along the bluff, the Japanese positions flanking the 5th Division zone had not been neutralized and the 5th, for the first time since D-day, did not attack.

This was a signal for a field day on maintenance, reorganization and resupply. Tanks, weapons, personal gear—all got a thorough going over, and troops got in some needed work on Division installations.

Company C, 5th Medical Battalion, landed during the lull in the fighting and began work on the Division hospital where demolition teams cleared the area of duds, and bulldozers scooped out underground wards and operating rooms. Engineers blasted the cave-infested sulphur blowhole, continued to install water distillation units, and enlarged the Division cemetery.

The 13th Marines continued to shell northern Iwo Jima as air observers called in adjustments. The D plus 6 score for the big howitzers was three blasted enemy artillery pieces, several burning trucks, a blazing ammunition dump, and two demolished houses.

One week to the day after the first waves of Marines stormed ashore on Iwo, a Marine OY-1 observation plane landed on the strip of Airfield No. 1. As Lieutenant Harvey Olson braked his tiny plane to a halt many Marines rushed out to congratulate him, but just then three quick enemy mortar bursts hit on the strip and sent the welcoming committee scurrying for cover. Three days later Lieutenant Roy G. Miller and the rest of his VMO-5 landed to provide aerial observation and spotting for Division artillery.

Near the strangely quiet front a pint-sized Corpsman, Pharmacist's Mate First Class Glen A. Lougee, wandered into an aid station and asked for a new first-aid kit. His clothes were stained with blood, his eyes were bloodshot, he looked as if he had not slept in days, and he had a story to tell.

He had followed the advance for three days, treating the wounded, usually under fire, and seeing to it that they got back to the rear. Earlier that morning he and another man had gone ahead of the lines to rescue a Marine with a bad leg wound. As they dragged their patient into a shell hole a mortar shell exploded in their midst. It killed Lougee's helper instantly, but somehow missed the Corpsman and his patient entirely.

"The guy was wonderful," Lougee told the doctor at the aid station. "He just looked up at me and said, 'What do we do now?'"

► D PLUS 7

CT 26, AFTER A DAY of comparative rest, launched a new attack on D plus 7 to take the O-2 Line in spite of the fact that the 3d Division had not yet secured the bluff line on the right. Although infantrymen and tanks pressed the attack vigorously and skillfully, the attack gained about fifty yards on both flanks and was stopped cold in the center of the line.

At this critical point, Captain Frank C. Caldwell's F. Company, LT 2/26, the only rifle company in the Division that had not seen front-line action, was committed and promptly drove forward for 250 yards. This assault was also supported by tanks which helped the infantry mightily but, as usual, acted as magnets for Japanese artillery and mortar fire.

As CT 26's drive penetrated farther into the Japanese MLR, groups of enemy soldiers—evidently forced above ground in order to move to new positions—could be seen moving around in the open, an event so rare in the Iwo Jima campaign as to warrant its inclusion in this history. This spectacle brought about a definite improvement in Marine morale, for no man likes to fight something he cannot see, and the sight of running Japs was, if nothing else, reassuring.

As always, during the attack men were killed and wounded. The loss of any man is serious, but some can be spared less readily than others. Among these was Captain Eugene B. Higgins, the only remaining officer in E Company, CT 26, who was succeeded as company commander by 1st Sergeant Jack V. Canzonieri. Lieutenant Rover G. Warren, S-3, and Captain Richard T. Welihan, S-1, of LT 2/26, were both hit and evacuated when the battalion CP took a direct artillery hit.

Corporal Harold W. Crabtree, one of the Division's heroic squad leaders, was killed during the attack, and, when the lines were finally adjusted, his body lay beyond the Marines' forward positions in an area swept by fire. Still, one Marine requested permission to go out and bring in the body. Under normal circumstances such a request would have been denied, but this Marine's commander gave approval and Corporal Luther C. Crabtree went out, under a blanket of covering fire and smoke, to bring back the body of his brother.

On the right of CT 26's line LT 3/26 pushed forward a hundred yards, slightly reduced enemy fire and advances in the 3d Division zone contributing toward making its advance easier and its position more secure. Tanks which took part in this attack probed into the Japanese lines and hit a jackpot—about five hundred Japanese preparing rice for their evening meal. The tank crews opened up with every gun they had, caused heavy casualties and dispersed those Japanese who were still able to leave under their own power.

On the left of the Division line, still guiding on the western shore of Iwo, "Tony's Boys" (Major Antonelli's LT 2/27) opened their D plus 7 attack after the 13th Marines and warships standing offshore had raked the area in front of them with fire. Company D, on the right of the battalion line, and Company E, moving along the cliff that bordered the western beaches, drove forward five hundred yards in two hours as LVT(A)s offshore pounded the cliffs in front of the LT's advancing troops with 75mm gun fire.

By noon, Captain William J. King's D Company was deep into the Japanese lines, leading the advance of the entire Division. At this point, however, 2/27 was stopped until LT 2/26 on its right could pull up abreast, and when it became apparent that no further advance could be made that day the position was consolidated with D Company still in front, and E and F Companies holding a line along the Division's left flank—the beach terraces—and tying in with LT 1/26 in the rear.

During the fighting in this sector, Corporal John W. Geddings, who had won the Silver Star on Choiseul, lost his life saving the lives of other Marines. His company had been taking heavy casualties and, when the shortage of litter bearers became acute, Geddings volunteered to help carry out the wounded. Ten minutes later he was hit by a mortar shell and killed. He had given his helmet to a wounded Marine—the piece of shrapnel that killed him had struck him in the neck.

During the day heavy artillery fired at fortified Japanese positions in the northern part of the island, and half-tracks sniped at Kama and Kangoku Rocks, two tide-washed lava shelves off the western beaches where swimmers had been observing for Japanese artillery. During the evening, just as the lines were being adjusted for the night, one counterattack was broken up before it got well started as artillery and mortars ranged in on a formation of three hundred Japanese massing in front of LT 2/26.

► CT 27 MOVES IN

CT 27 MOVED UP at dawn of D plus 8 and took over the 5th Marine Division sector from CT 26, lining up with LT 2/27 on the left (west), LT 1/27 in the center and LT 3/27 on the right (east). CT 26, less LT 1/26, which had been used steadily to plug gaps in the line, moved into Division reserve.

After a heavy artillery and naval gunfire preparation, Colonel Wornham's regiment moved into the attack—and immediately ran into some of the heaviest fighting any Marine unit had hit on Iwo Jima.

In the center of the line, LT 1/27 quickly pushed forward about two hundred yards, and then hit a heavily defended cluster of pillboxes. A half-track got one before its crew was in turn picked off by rifle fire. Support from 37mm guns was out of the question—there were no suitable positions for the guns to fire from—and so the task fell where it usually did—on the infantry. Company C moved in with flamethrowers and demolitions and by noon had reduced the positions and moved on. In the middle of the afternoon the company ran up against another fortified area, but the story was different here—tanks were available and the infantry, supported by their fire, made much shorter work of the emplacements.

Company A, too, had been having its troubles. Driving ahead, it had occupied the top of a rocky ridge—occupied it, in fact, with ominously little effort. Before the company could consolidate, it was hit by heavy fire—rifles, machine guns, grenades and mortars—from its flanks and rear. Marines along the top of the ridge were trapped and cut off by fire from hidden emplacements, caves, and spider-holes along the flanks and base of the ridge. The 1st Platoon was all but disintegrated in the first blast of fire, its leader, Lieutenant Clair Voss, hit, and all but two men in its 1st Squad killed or wounded.

Finally, the company pulled back, bringing its wounded off the ridge as it came. Altogether, the action had cost Company A eight killed and fifty wounded by the time Company B moved up from battalion reserve to take its place. The ridge was plastered by artillery that night; the next morning Marines who retook it found a wounded man there from the attack of the day before, passed by unnoticed during the withdrawal. Not a single shell fragment had touched him.

On the right of the Division line, LT 3/27 moved rapidly against a ridge guarding the approach to Hill 362—key to the defenses in northern Iwo. Company G charged the ridge in a frontal assault and was thrown back, whereupon Gunnery Sergeant William G. Walsh took thirty men around the right of the ridge. This flanking group was thrown back on its first try, but Walsh reorganized his men and led them up the slope again—and into a barrage of hand grenades from Japanese on the reverse slope. Ten Marines were killed, including Walsh, who dived on a hand grenade thrown into a hole where he and several other men had taken cover. Finally, as other elements of the company moved up, the ridge was held.

Company I, to the left of G, moved into the jagged, rock-strewn ground of northern Iwo, where the fighting reached such intensity that men ignored wounds in their determination to get at the enemy—to destroy him. Corporal Harry Towne, among many others, continued to throw grenades after he could no longer walk—his legs had been badly mangled and partly blown away.

At the end of the day, CT 27 had gained about five hundred yards through the heart of the Japanese defensive belt. Still ahead was the bloodiest fight of all—the battle for Hill 362.

In the fighting on D plus 8 and the battle still ahead, there was really more than one war. There was fighting on the front lines, such as they were, and the fighting to clear out the Japanese from previously captured ground into which they had moved through their labyrinth of tunnels. There was almost always mopping up to be done before the day's attack could begin.

The Japanese were also mining everything in sight—and doing it surprisingly well. Roads into the northern half of the island were thick with mines, some standard and some improvised, and Marine-built roads, if not carefully guarded, were invariably re-mined during the night by infiltrating Japanese.

The battle for Iwo Jima was also characterized by the Japanese use of much heavier mortars than the Marines and Army had encountered in earlier Pacific campaigns. The grenade launcher (knee mortar) and the infantry 81mm and 90mm mortars were still around, and the Japanese were also using 150mm mortars and a few 320s.

One novel feature of the early days of the Iwo campaign was the Imperial Japanese version of a buzz bomb, which Marines promptly dubbed "freight train" because of the weird, chugging noise the projectile made as it passed overhead. The trouble was that the Japs had some difficulty with range adjustment and usually missed the island completely. One rocket did hit on Green Beach and several hit Suribachi, but none caused any great damage. Marine observers soon spotted the launching platforms, and artillery and air strikes destroyed them—the "freight trains" stopped running after D plus 9.

► HILL 362

ON D PLUS 9 the 5th Marine Division was squarely up against Hill 362—the highest point on the western side of the island and the backbone of the Japanese defense in this sector. Its sharp, barren edges were chopped up with caves, and concrete pillboxes and blockhouses dotted its nearly vertical cliffs. Around its base, jagged, rocky outcrops commanded every approach to the hill, and the hill itself commanded all approaches to the 0-3 Line, the Division's next objective.

The initial assignment to take Hill 362 went to Lieutenant Colonel Robertson's LT 3/27, while Lieutenant Colonel Butler's LT 1/27 attacked a jagged, irregular ridge line running more or less from Hill 362 down to the western beaches.

In the teeth of heavy fire, Marines opened the attack across some two hundred yards of bare, rolling, sandy ground, and elements of I Company, on the left, worked their way to the top of the hill. Here, however, they were cut off from units below as the Japanese counterattacked behind a heavy barrage of grenades. The company commander, Captain Philip R. Gary, was mortally wounded, and Lieutenant Kenneth S. Nelson took command, reorganized his men, and pulled the company back about two hundred yards on the slope of the hill.

under heavy and accurate rifle fire. In three minutes, twelve men had fallen—eleven of them shot through the head. The Japanese topped off this assault with one of the heaviest grenade barrages of the campaign.

In the face of this barrage, Corpsmen worked against terrible odds. As one Marine, his legs shattered, dragged himself to a shell crater, Pharmacist's Mate First Class John H. Willis saw him and maneuvered over to the hole. A grenade rolled in. Willis tossed it out. Another fell, and Willis batted it away and went to work on his patient. Then came more grenades—five, six, seven times Willis tossed them back. The eighth was timed to burst on arrival and Willis died with his patient.

LT 1/27, on the left (west) of the 3d Battalion, moved against the ridge line west of Hill 362 and was immediately taken under fire from the front and from pillboxes on the left flank along the western beaches. A half-track, and finally tanks, were brought into the battle and had nearly destroyed the position in front of C Company by the time Company A came up to relieve it in the afternoon.

Company A, comparatively fresh, moved out against light opposition and had picked up about 150 yards when it, in turn, was hit by fire from a gorge on its right flank. This position yielded quickly—although not easily—when Lieutenant Jesse P. Julian, most of his own platoon pinned down, borrowed a platoon from LT 1/26 on his right and, while Corporal Ronald R. Caplinger led one squad directly against the gorge, took the remainder of the platoon on a wide flanking movement and fell on the Japanese from the rear.

was also having hard going against machine guns firing from the ridge to its front, but finally worked its way onto the ridge, losing 17 dead and 27 wounded in the process.

Altogether, D plus 9 would not have seemed to be a particularly productive day. Marine losses had been heavy (in the entire Division casualties had now reached four thousand), but there was now some indication that the Japanese resources in man and matériel had been stretched to the breaking point, and that a breakthrough of sorts might soon be achieved.

Division equipment losses had also been heavy—8 (about one-third) of the armored amtracs had been destroyed, 90 out of 216 LVTs were out of action, and only 38 out of 100 DUKWs were still serviceable. To add to the difficulty, the Division ammunition dump was shelled and set afire during the night of D plus 9. Thirty per cent of the Division's ammunition was lost, but by dawn service troops and Headquarters and Service Battery of the 13th Marines had brought the fire under control, in spite of the fact that Japanese planes were over the island during the night.

► CT 28 COMES NORTH

ON D PLUS 10, CT 28 came north from Suribachi and took over the assault against Hill 362 and its supporting positions from CT 27. An early morning attack by the 1st and 2d Battalions of CT 28 carried the crest of the hill, but the Marines on top found themselves staring over the brink of an eighty-foot cliff into a rocky draw. Securing the reverse slope of 362 was going to be rougher than the attack against the forward slope.

The draw which the 28th had to clear ran parallel to the ridge line, and was bisected by an antitank ditch that ran perpendicular to the hill. Covering the ditch were strong positions in the cliff face, inaccessible from the top.

In an effort to break the stalemate, Company A moved around the right shoulder of 362 and into the draw while B Company made a similar move to the left. Almost immediately Company A was hit by grenades and rifle fire and its company commander, Captain Aaron G. Wilkins, last original company commander in the battalion, killed. Captain Russel J. Parsons replaced him.

Company B's CO, Captain Robert A. Wilson, was wounded leading his prong of the attack, and Lieutenant Charles A. Weaver took command of the company.

It soon became apparent that the advance was stalled, at least temporarily, and the troops dug in for the night.

The first Japanese prisoners—Korean labor troops—had been captured that day, and they reported that caves ahead of the Marine lines were filled with enemy wounded and that food and water were running low. Not all of the twelve prisoners seized by the Division up to D plus 10 had been taken willingly, however.

One enemy soldier, his skin scorched by a flame-thrower, had been brought to the Division hospital for treatment. Although he was well treated he persisted in getting up from his stretcher. As Corporal Lonnie E. Nolan tried to escort him back, the prisoner turned, gave a shrill scream, and attacked the Marine guard. Nolan parried his blows and then grappled with him, but the crazed prisoner broke away and raced into a ward where Marine wounded were lying. As he attacked a defenseless casualty, Nolan pumped five bullets into his body.

An aerial view of southern Iwo on D plus 11 shows debris-littered landing areas, thousands of foxholes, supply dumps, and command posts of support troops.

Attack for 0-3

WITH THE 5th DIVISION embroiled in battle for Hill 362 along the 0-2 Line, the 3d Division, still on the right of the 5th, drove rapidly north-east across Iwo's third (still uncompleted) airfield and then swung directly east. This maneuver opened a gap between the two divisions, and General Rockey ordered CT 26 into the line on the right of CT 28.

CT 28 opened the D plus 11 attack against the reverse-slope positions on Hill 362. Riflemen covered as an armored dozer cut a path through the antitank ditch which ran perpendicular to the hill, enabling a platoon of Shermans to get through. As the tanks blasted positions in the reverse slope of Hill 362, E Company of LT 2/28 charged across the open area and gained the next ridge line where they held on, even though they were hit by fire from both front and rear. Among those killed during the afternoon was Lieutenant Colonel Johnson, the battalion commander, who was succeeded in command by Major Thomas B. Pearce, Jr., his executive officer.

On the right, CT 26 was committed during the afternoon and advanced as far as the island's northern plateau, where the troops dug in for the night.

During the night, about fifty enemy tried to infiltrate the lines near Hill 362, and some of them made it. Back at a company command post, Sergeant William G. Harrell awoke to find the sudden attack swirling around him. He opened fire with his carbine and killed two of the enemy, but an exploding grenade tore off his left hand and fractured his thigh. Crippled, he continued to wage a fierce lone battle with the attackers. A saber-wielding Japanese soldier rushed his foxhole and inflicted a deep, slashing wound. Harrell killed him with his pistol.

After ordering a wounded companion to safety, the exhausted, blood-soaked Marine met the challenge of two more enemy soldiers who charged him and dropped a grenade near his hand. Harrell killed one with his pistol and then grasped the sputtering grenade with his good right hand, pushing it painfully toward the other enemy soldier who crouched nearby to deliver a death blow. The Marine sergeant saw his assailant destroyed, but his remaining hand was severed in the explosion. At dawn Harrell was evacuated from a position hedged by twelve dead Japanese, at least five of whom he had killed personally. He was awarded the Medal of Honor.

(General Kuribayashi, discouraged over the failure of his soldiers to cut through Marine lines at night, radioed Tokyo: "The look-out American forces has become very strict and it is difficult to pass through their guarded line. Don't overestimate the value of cutting-in [infiltration] attacks.")

► D PLUS 12

D PLUS 12 was a memorable day for the 5th Division. It was one of the biggest ground-gaining periods of the operation, the first B-29 made a successful emergency landing on Iwo, and three Marines (one of them Sergeant Harrell) performed feats of valor which won them the Medal of Honor.

The terrain as well as the Japanese opposed the attack. A series of ridges and gorges lay in the path of CT 28 while the ground ahead of the 26th Marines was heavily mined and the enemy on Hill 362B ahead were able to sweep the area with fire. And, as usual, new roads had to be built before tanks could move in to support the attack.

Once dozers had pushed these roads through, the 26th Marines, supported by tanks, attacked in the right center of the Division line in one of the most successful but most costly actions of the operation. Company F advanced more than six hundred yards to the high ground to its front, won a fierce grenade duel and then held its positions in spite of heavy casualties. Companies D and E, using flamethrowers, bazookas, and demolitions, blasted through a series of caves and pillboxes to seize—and hold—Hill 362B.

During the 26th Marines' attack, Corporal Charles J. Berry and Private First Class William R. Caddy performed identical feats of valor at the cost of their lives, and were posthumously awarded the Medal of Honor. Caddy, a rifleman in I Company, LT 3/26, and Berry, a machine gunner attached to LT 1/26, saved the lives of several of their comrades by deliberately absorbing with their own bodies the blast of grenades thrown into the groups.

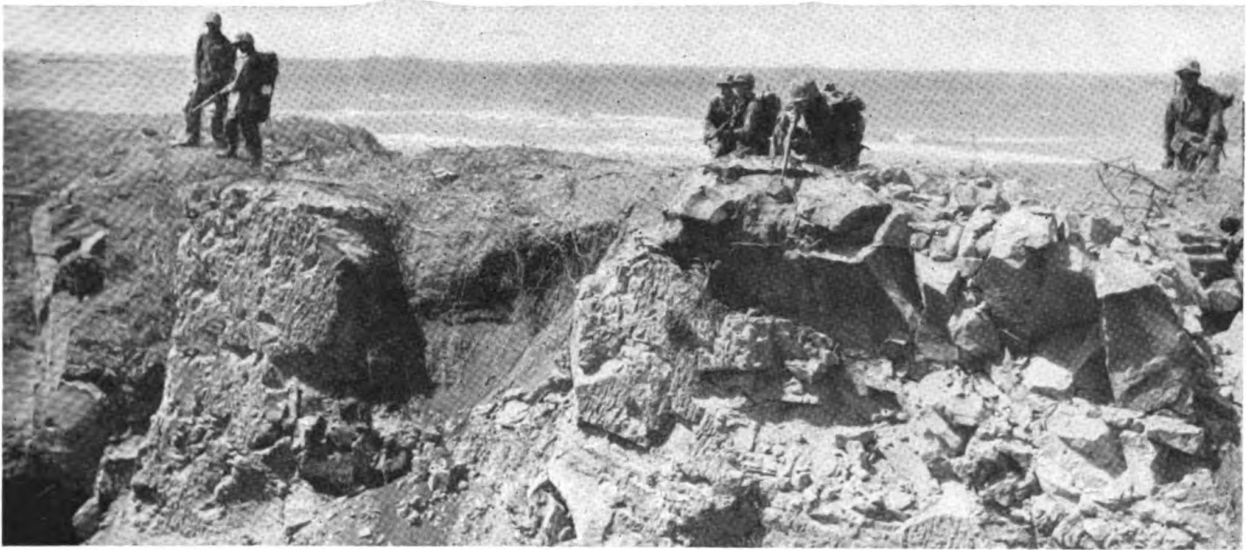

CT 28, attacking on the left of CT 26, met with varying success. LT 1/28, with C Company spearheading the attack, gained five hundred yards while the other two landing teams, supported by tanks, 37mm guns, and half-tracks, gained about 150 yards in heavy fighting. Captain Jack R. Rhodes, B Company's fifth commander since the landing, was wounded six minutes after he took over the unit.

All along the front, casualties were reaching crippling proportions, and weapons-company and headquarters men were sent into the lines as riflemen to fill in the ranks of the assault companies.

As the attack moved north, Marines found fewer concrete emplacements and more caves. Although the Japanese had lost much of their artillery, heavy mortars, and rocket launchers, captured or destroyed, the mass of troops and automatic weapons at their disposal as they were compressed into less and less space compensated somewhat for the loss. Too, General Kuribayashi continued to use his troops intelligently, with an eye to inflicting the heaviest possible casualties on the attacking Marines. At a stage in the battle when many Japanese commanders would have been exhorting their troops to futile Banzai charges, the General continued to use his reserves to back up only his most desperately threatened positions. There is evidence that Kuribayashi recognized the superiority of American weapons, for he urged his superiors in Tokyo to copy the Garand rifle and the BAR.

► THE ATTACK STALLS

THE TWO TIRED REGIMENTS, after a night of heading off infiltrating Japanese, (CT 26 alone bagged ninety-seven) attacked again on D plus 13 against a front swept by machine-gun and rifle fire from a new line of caves and tangled underbrush. The attack was sluggish and the Japanese seemed to sense it, two or three times forming groups of two or three hundred for counterattacks which were promptly broken up by artillery and mortar fire.

A squad spreads out along the edge of a gully to knock off snipers caught below them.

Some units pushed forward in more or less uncoordinated fashion and were promptly hit on the flanks by fire and forced to withdraw, leaving the net gain for the day at zero. The only successful move, in fact, was made by Division Headquarters which moved from its original location near the eastern beaches to a position north of Airfield No. 1 on the west side of the island.

Behind the lines, replacements trudged single file up the road, staring silently at the tired, bearded Marines coming back. Here and there among the replacements were men wearing blue dungarees and shirts of the Navy, Marines returning from hospital ships after being wounded earlier in the operation.

General Schmidt, the Corps commander, realized that his three divisions were exhausted from two weeks of steady fighting and ordered that no attack be made on D plus 14. Troops all along the front reorganized, assigned replacements, improved positions, cleared mines, bulldozed new routes for tanks, and made other preparations for resuming the attack. Newly won high ground in the north made observation posts on Suri-bachi obsolete, and artillery observers and "flash-bang" units moved to new positions near the assault units.

Although there was no attack going on the Division continued to suffer casualties. Lieutenant Colonel Butler, LT 1/27's commander, was killed by an artillery shell and was replaced by Lieutenant Colonel Justin G. Duryea, the regimental operations officer.

At the front it was difficult if not impossible to distinguish rank. Officers wore no insignia on their issue dungarees and carried the same arms as enlisted Marines. In one instance, a telephone man crawled along checking communications between units when he saw another Marine sitting on the wire.

"Hey you," he demanded, "Get the hell off that line. Can't you see I'm trying to check it?"

A lieutenant colonel who commanded the battalion in that area stood up and stepped aside. "All right, lad," he said with a chuckle, "but just between you and me I'm getting damned tired of taking orders from privates."

Two weeks after the landing air-mail service to Iwo Jima was in operation. The first mail had arrived by ship on D plus 5 followed by another batch five days later. On D plus 8 V-mail processing began and most of the letters written on Iwo were of this type.

The most prolific writers on the island were the combat correspondents attached to the Public Information Section under Captain Robert L. Jones and Lieutenant Burns W. Lee. Newspapers all over America printed their eyewitness accounts of the fighting and their interviews with hundreds of 5th Division Marines. During the campaign one correspondent, Sergeant Henry Weaver, asked a veteran Paramarine how the fighting compared with that on Bougainville. The trooper gazed off into space and then replied:

Unfinished Airfield No. 3 as seen from Hill 362B.

"Bougainville? . . . Beautiful Bougainville!"

The western beaches had been developed by this time and were used for discharging ammunition and supplies, and, although most of the transports and freighters had been unloaded and had left the area, the island was still ringed by American warships whose guns continued to support units ashore.

Naval gunfire was controlled by the 5th Joint Assault Signal Company (JASCO) whose shore fire-control parties, consisting of a Navy officer and Marine communication personnel, were assigned to each landing team to adjust ships' fire on caves, ravines, troop concentrations, and targets in Iwo's coastal cliffs.

Several times during darkness LCI mortar gunboats dropped thousands of rounds ahead of the front lines, and night-firing destroyers lobbed star shells to help troops spot enemy infiltrations and groups forming for counterattacks. Before the operation was over, more than a thousand naval gunfire missions had been called down in the 5th Division area and over sixty-four thousand rounds of ammunition fired.

During this brief lull in the fighting, base development of Iwo, including airfield construction, was transferred to the island commander, Major General

James E. Chaney, USA. Airfield No. 1's runway was being lengthened from four thousand to five thousand feet, and a bomb-disposal company was clearing Airfield No. 2 of mines and duds.

Transport planes were now operating regularly from No. 1. Five days earlier the first American fighter plane had landed and was soon joined by twenty-eight P-51 Mustangs and twelve P-61 Black Widow night fighters, all of which were eventually used for combat air patrol over the island—consisting of two P-61s at night, eight P-51s during the day and twelve P-51s at dawn and dusk. The seventeen Cub planes from VMO squadrons were flying daily artillery spotting and observation missions.

Attack aircraft, which executed missions requested by battalion and regimental commanders, were controlled by air liaison parties of JASCO. (During the campaign Division units asked for 142 air strikes and got 96.) Most of the installations these planes hit were enemy gun positions and rocket-launching sites, blockhouses, cave entrances, and coast-defense guns. Planes strafed and used bombs, Napalm, and a gasoline-diesel oil mixture. Army Mustangs joined Navy and Marine carrier planes in these strikes.

The 5th Division hospital was now handling nearly three hundred casualties daily, and a staff of 16 doctors and 150 Corpsmen from the 5th Medical Battalion under Lieutenant Commander William W. Ayres, worked around the clock. Wounded men, some of them quiet under morphine, filled the dug-in hospital tents and awaited their turn in the busy operating rooms. Many Marines were unable to tell where their wounds were or what had hit them.

Outside the hospital, the procession of jeep ambulances from the front was never-ending. Men wounded in the north saw the southern part of Iwo for the first time in many days, and those who could get there went to see the airfields which they remembered as pitted open spaces raked by enemy fire.

Air evacuation of the seriously wounded to Guam began, and before the campaign ended, 2,358 wounded had been flown out in the big planes.

Chaplains, who made their headquarters at the regimental command posts, found that their greatest usefulness was near the front close to battalion aid stations. Formal services were limited to those few times battalions were brought out of the lines into rest areas, but many men welcomed Scripture reading and prayer with the chaplains in their foxholes. Moving around the front Chaplain Bradley (CT 28), said Mass daily for every company in the regiment. His altar was the largest foxhole in the area. Father Bradley never wore a helmet; back in camp the men had gotten used to seeing him in a baseball cap, and he wanted to be sure they would recognize him under several layers of sand and dust.

To the south even Suribachi's face began to change as the 31st Construction Battalion built a road to the summit. Below in a prisoner stockade one Japanese officer wept. "For twenty years," he said, "we tried to make a road to the top and you did it in two weeks!"

Communications had improved steadily since the early days of the campaign and, as continuous telephone contact between all units was established, field radio stations began to close down and many operators and message center men joined wire teams. Telephone men installed and repaired lines at all hours of the day and night, pushing ahead with the assault companies, extending their wire to allow immediate contact between command posts and the front lines. They were shot at often, mistaken for the enemy at night, and killed many enemy who attempted to interfere with their work.

A Division bakery was set up and raised sagging spirits by delivering rolls and doughnuts to the troops. Another factor which helped morale was the operation of the Red Cross. In the regiments they took charge of the distribution of post exchange rations and provided additional items—towels, soap, candy, cards, and stationery—from Red Cross supplies.

► THE ATTACK RENEWED

AN ARTILLERY PREPARATION that took in every unit in Corps artillery opened the D plus 15 attack. The 13th Marines (5th Division) alone fired 6,200 75mm and 105mm shells and the 12th (3d Division) and 14th Marines (4th Division) blasted the Japanese position at a comparable rate.

At K-hour the barrage began to roll forward a hundred yards every seven minutes, but any hope that the troops—their objective the O-3 Line—could hold this rate of advance soon faded. The day's attack netted the 5th Division between fifty and a hundred yards in the center and on the right, and gained exactly nothing in CT 28's zone on the left. Resistance was bitter, and the Division took about two hundred casualties during the day.

The jagged, broken country into which the 5th Division now moved minimized the effect of the powerful supporting fire available to the Marines, and left the issue to be decided in the highly personal struggle of Marine against Japanese, with the Jap fighting from prepared, concealed positions. To make matters more difficult, Japanese in by-passed caves fired into the back of Marine formations with platoon and squad leaders as primary targets.

CT 27, in action on the right of the Division line, hit a particularly chopped-up area just north of the enemy's third (uncompleted) airfield. Major Antonelli's LT 2/27, especially, had heavy going, and used bazookas, flame-throwing tanks, and demolitions to try to pry the enemy loose from his positions, without success. The battalion lost more than half of the Division's 200 casualties for the day, 14 killed and 101 wounded, many of them cut down during desperate efforts to evacuate casualties who were finally taken out under the protection of covering fire and smoke screens.

The terrain was too rough for tanks to operate effectively, and dozers brought up to punch through roads for them were slowed and often disabled by mines when they—or the tanks—ventured into areas not cleared by engineers.

Hundreds of heroic deeds were recorded by photographers and combat correspondents attached to the Division. Staff Sergeant Tony Smith pounds out his story in the shadow of a wrecked Japanese plane.

The one-two punch. A flamethrower fries the holed-up Japanese while a demolitions-armed Marine stands by to blow up the position.

Credit for one of the few successes achieved by 5th Division troops during the day goes to Captain Kyle Gillispie, air observer from CT 27, who was flying over Japanese territory when he spotted an entire enemy artillery battalion moving cautiously along a partly open tunnel leading from one large cave to another. Checking the position on his map, he radioed his information back to headquarters, and within minutes Marine artillery had opened fire, registered, and destroyed the entire Japanese unit and its equipment.

► D PLUS 16

D PLUS 16 brought all three regiments more success in terms of ground gained than had the attack of the day before. LT 3/28 pushed forward six hundred yards through rocky gorges against moderate small arms and machine-gun fire, leaving some caves and bunkers for elements following along behind to mop up. By dusk all three battalions of the combat team were on Hill 215, which dominated the immediate area, and were mopping up.

In this drive, the Division Reconnaissance Company was attached to LT 3/28 and saw heavy fighting in the drive for the objective. Earlier it had distinguished itself in the pre-landing reconnaissance off the landing beaches.

As CT 28 was consolidating, a stiff breeze began blowing toward the Marine lines from the Japanese-held area, bringing with it eye-smarting sulphur fumes and the smoke from a burning enemy ammunition dump. Unit commanders, always alert to the possibility of the enemy's employing poison gas, sounded an alert which brought hundreds of gas masks into use. The alarm soon passed, however, and CT 28 went on with its reorganizing.

CT 27 made limited gains during the day against an irregular ridge line—sometimes called Nishi Ridge—in the vicinity of Nishi Village. This was one of the strongest remaining defensive positions on the island. LT 2/27 advanced two hundred yards to reach this high ground overlooking the north coast of Iwo, but after getting a blood bath from grenades, knee mortars, and sniper fire from the high jagged rocks, the troops were forced to withdraw when LT 2/21 of the 3d Division retired on their right flank. LT 3/27, meanwhile, had driven five hundred yards against light resistance.

CT 26 had launched a pre-dawn surprise attack in the center to reduce a strong pocket of resistance. By late morning these defenses had been smashed and the 3d Battalion moved on, but reined up after a 150-yard gain to help tanks and half-tracks destroy a cluster of caves and pillboxes.

Later Captain Donald H. Castle's Company H, LT 3/26, and Company A, LT 1/26, commanded by Lieutenant Robert C. Miller, continued the northward advance against resistance no heavier than an occasional shot from a sniper's rifle.

Finally H Company came up against a thirty-foot ridge which appeared to be suspiciously quiet. Men began to feel that they were being watched, and tension grew as everyone sensed that something was wrong.

Then they saw it—a smaller dune concealed an entrance to a cave. This position obviously was an important Japanese command post—how important the Marines soon found out as Japanese came charging out to fill the air with grenades. Company H settled down to a duel and Japanese bodies began to pile up.

Lieutenant Miller, meanwhile, had led his men around the ridge and had set up his machine guns facing the rear entrance to the cave. As demolitions men blasted shut the front side, Miller's Leathernecks pumped fire into trapped enemy who attempted to escape through the rear.

Soon the cave appeared to be empty and the demolition squad sealed the second entrance. Thirty Marines scaled the ridge and gazed at the ground over which they would have to fight later in the day.

Suddenly the earth began to tremble. The scarred hill quivered violently in a rising crescendo ending in an explosion which could be heard all over Iwo Jima. The entire ridge and the Marines on it were blown high into the air. Men nearby were stunned by the concussion. As soon as they regained their senses and realized that the Japanese had blown up the position they ran for the hill, shouting for their comrades.

As the first arrivals started to dig frantically, others followed and soon Marines were pulling charred, broken bodies to the surface. Some of the toughest men could not stand the sight and began to vomit. Others, tears running down their faces, stumbled away from the scene.

The ridge was a mass of twisted, torn, burning rock and sand. Smoke rose from a ragged hole so large that a good-sized apartment house could have been slipped inside.

Forty-three casualties resulted from this action. Captain Castle, however, moved among his dazed infantrymen, reorganized all the survivors in the area, and led them in a renewed attack.

That night the Japanese made repeated attempts to infiltrate the American lines. Several of their patrols stumbled into trip flares and "good hunting" reports flowed back to higher headquarters. Along the front artillery forward observer parties joined with the infantry in beating off the Japanese. Lieutenant Howard K. Low and his team were trapped twice behind enemy lines and helped to break up three counterattacks.

► FIGHTING TRIPLETS

THE 5TH DIVISION on D plus 17 was directed by Corps to make its main effort on the right and seize the remainder of Iwo Jima in its zone. (The same order went to the 3d and 4th Divisions, both of which broke through to the northern coast. In the 5th Division zone, however, General Kuribayashi had marshalled his forces for a last stand, and the end result of the Corps maneuver was the formation of a pocket in front of the 5th Division.)

In its attack, CT 27 was faced with a series of inter-connected caves and tunnels with the area around them heavily mined. The strongest barriers were in front of LT 2/27 where both the reverse and forward slopes of the rocky ledges were heavily defended. Colonel Wornham's men met this challenge by bulldozing roads into enemy territory and then moving in to blast and overrun defenses so that the infantry could advance. Hard hand-to-hand fighting ground out 150 yards in this right flank sector.

CT 26's center attack gained little ground. LT 1/26, which had been in the front lines sixteen days and seventeen nights (out of nineteen), had gained about forty yards but that night gave up the ground as untenable. CT 28, on the left, had met moderate resistance during a 300-yard advance.

Rocket launching crews, supporting the 5th Division attack, blasted the enemy in their holes and buried them where they fought. Tanks bumped through the rough, heavily mined terrain, their 75mm guns pounding pillboxes from point-blank range while infantrymen followed close behind. Demolitions men ran from cave to cave sealing them shut with explosive charges.

During the day's fighting a rifle platoon from E Company, LT 2/27, was halted by a sudden concentration of fire and the platoon leader, Lieutenant Jack Lummus, moved forward of his front lines in an effort to neutralize the Japanese position. Although he was knocked flat when an enemy grenade exploded nearby, he immediately recovered and moved ahead in spite of the intensified barrage, and quickly located, attacked, and destroyed the emplacement. Instantly taken under fire by the garrison of a supporting pillbox and other enemy riflemen, he finally fell under the impact of a second enemy grenade. He disregarded painful shoulder wounds, and continued his heroic one-man assault by charging the second pillbox and killing all the occupants.

Returning to his platoon, Lummus encouraged his men to advance, and at the same time directed the fire of supporting tanks against other stubbornly holding Japanese positions. Held up again by a devastating barrage, Lummus once again moved into the open, rushed a third heavily fortified position, and killed the defenders. Determined to crush all resistance he led his men attacking foxholes and spider traps and systematically reduced these positions until he stepped on a land mine and was mortally wounded. Lummus's heroism won him the Medal of Honor.

D plus 17 brought a new idea for killing Japanese. Sergeant Paul S. Poznar and his artillery crew brought a 75mm howitzer into the front lines and raised havoc with the enemy at 100-yard range. Although every shell had to be carried by hand for four hundred yards, Poznar and his Marines blasted 180 rounds into pillboxes, caves and enemy mortar positions. Another gun crew, led by Sergeant Paul E. Bohrer, broke down their 1,600-pound howitzer into seven parts, carried it forward, and sited it for direct fire. This field piece knocked out every enemy position in a 300-yard-wide sector.

By this time the 1st Battalion, 13th Marines, had fired thirty-seven thousand rounds of artillery at the Japanese, and the twelve howitzers of the 2d Battalion had sent more than twenty-two thousand shells into northern Iwo.

Marine losses were becoming so heavy that all infantry units were in critical need of replacements. Qualified small-unit leaders and aggressive, highly trained riflemen had become so few that offensive efficiency and spirit were seriously affected. Provisional platoons of headquarters personnel were formed, and companies rushed up cooks, bakers, mortarmen, and communicators to fill gaps along the thinly held front. Two hundred men from the 13th Marines were designated infantry replacements and reported to CT 26 and CT 28. The shore party regiment was disbanded and the 5th Pioneer Battalion prepared to move to the front.

The campaign had developed into a battle of attrition against Japanese positions. Each cave had to be blown and each pillbox destroyed—and there were many of both. Marines began to find snipers dressed in Marine uniforms, and soon were not sure who was going to shoot at them. The enemy, too, began to booby-trap his dead.

Everywhere the Japanese fought until they died. One case was typical: A flamethrower team moved cautiously up to a pillbox and spurted a jet of flame through the entrance. An enemy soldier burst through the opening, his flesh and clothing a mass of flame. In each hand was a grenade. Even as he threw them, he fell into a lifeless, charred heap.

One of the strongest enemy night attacks of the campaign was launched the night of March 8 (D plus 17) against the 4th Division. It was a desperate attempt to break through to Airfield No. 1 to destroy planes and installations. The charge carried through the lines into command post areas but was finally turned back with a loss of 784 enemy troops. When this effort was shattered, the Japanese settled down to a last-stand defense.

A Final Pocket Forms

"ALL SURVIVING FIGHTING UNITS have sustained heavy losses," General Kuribayashi radioed Tokyo early on D plus 18. "I am very sorry that I have let the enemy occupy one part of Japanese territory but I am taking comfort in giving him heavy damages." And well he might take comfort. His own and his men's days were numbered, but he had conducted a skillful, savagely fought defense.

Now that Iwo's main defensive positions (the chain whose strongest link had been Hill 362) had been penetrated, the "bad-lands" area of the northern half of the island lay in the path of General Rockey's 5th Division. Here, effective observation for any distance and long fields of fire were nowhere to be had and men and individual weapons were the determining factors of the battle.

Northern Iwo, broken up by thousands of sandstone-like outcroppings, was easy digging for the defenders and, at the same time, eliminated the need for revetting emplacements. So easy was the digging and so determined was General Kuribayashi that his troops would profit by the lessons of cave warfare and protection from artillery, naval gunfire, and air bombardment learned on Peleliu that he had long before issued an order that each position would be dug to a minimum depth of six meters—an order that was still rigidly obeyed.

In addition, each such underground position was required to have multiple entrances for protection against fire of all kinds and for escape when demolitions sealed one entrance. Flamethrowers could not reach to the depth needed to burn out the defenders or rob their caverns of enough oxygen to produce suffocation.

Along with this superb cover went effective concealment. The sandstone outcroppings blended well with the uniforms and natural coloring of the Japanese. Too, nothing had to move but the individual. The Japanese had no need for motor transport to deploy men or move equipment because troops were confined to the small areas which they were responsible for defending, and all essential military supplies—ammunition, food, water, medicine, etc.—were stored underground in each local area. Marines never captured a sizeable Japanese supply dump.

Japanese prisoners, one of whom was a battalion commander, did not know the location of Kuribayashi's headquarters or the details of defensive installations other than those in their unit's immediate area. All of these factors eliminated for the Japanese the need for effective surface roads and routes of communication.

The enemy, then, had terrain of splendid defensive quality, and underground protection achieved at a minimum of effort for all his personnel and supplies. The very smallness of the fortress he was defending denied to his attacker the maneuver room he so cherished, and nullified the mobility his equipment so lavishly provided. Above all General Kuribayashi had remaining under his command an estimated three thousand warriors pledged to die for the Emperor before accepting defeat—men who had no place to which they might retreat—men whose temper can be gauged by this song:

IWO JIMA GARRISON SONG¹

Where dark tides billow in the ocean
A wink shaped isle of mighty fame
Guards the gateway to our empire:
IWO JIMA is its name.
We brave men who have been chosen
To defend this island strand
Filled with faith in certain triumph
Yearn to strike for Fatherland.
Thoughts of our task are ever with us
From dawn to dusk we train with zeal

At our Emperor's command
We'll bring the enemy to heel.
Oh, for Emperor and homeland
There's no burden we won't bear.
Disease, hardship, and foul water;
These are less to us than air.
In the lonely mid-Pacific,
Our sweat a fortress will prepare.
If the enemy attacks us
Let him come, we will not care.
Until the hated Anglo-Saxons
Lie before us in the dust
Officers and men together
Work and struggle, strive and trust.

From the earliest days of the campaign, Iwo Jima's terrain characteristics and the dispositions and doctrines of its defenders had limited the tactical choices available to unit commanders of any Marine echelon. Now, more than ever, fields of fire were very limited and the corrugated terrain enormously complicated the business of pressing an attack. Marine units had to capture the forward face of a sandstone ridge, fight across the top of it, and then fight their way down the reverse slope. During the reverse-slope phase of the action Marines had to contend with Japanese occupying positions underneath them as well as fire from the next ridge, which was inevitably and apparently unendingly an exact duplicate of the one they had just taken. The complete process of fighting up the face of one ridge, across it, and down the other side usually meant a net advance of about fifty yards. Crossing the valleys between ridges was, of course, the most difficult part of the action because the unit going across drew fire from the front, both flanks, and the rear.

Perhaps worst of all, every Marine commander fighting through this sandstone jungle knew that underneath him were healthy Japanese who would be out that night to harass his rear, steal his supplies, either recover or booby-trap their own dead, and booby-trap his dead if he didn't get them out first.

And so the battle for Iwo Jima was ending as it had begun, at close quarters, with Marine forces stripped of the advantages of their fire power, fighting an enemy who had been indoctrinated since childhood that the greatest honor he would ever know was to die for his Emperor. He could not be threatened out of his position by encirclement or by superior force; he could not be induced to surrender because of his hopeless position—tactically or strategically; he had to be killed.

On D plus 18 the attack began on Japanese positions in the western half of the island and north of Nishi Village. This was the main Japanese pocket and remained so to the end of the campaign. There were other pockets in the 3d and 4th Division zones, but these were cleaned out quickly. The Japanese in the pocket facing the 5th Division never retreated and fought to the end.

During the attack of D plus 18 and 19, CT 28 gained about four hundred yards and came within sight of a deep gorge to its front, while battered CT 26, with less than a hundred officers left, waited for CT 28 to come abreast. When it did so, CT 26 jumped off but made only small gains against cave positions in the jagged ravines, losing about 215 men in the process. (Since it had come into the lines ten days before, CT 26 had gained nearly a thousand yards across the rough northern plateau.) CT 27, on the right, gained about 250 yards, aided by headquarters men who had been put into the lines. Although it received 215 replacements the 26th took that many casualties and made only small gains against concealed cave positions in the rugged ravines.

Furious hand-to-hand battles raged all along this unit's front. Company C, leading the 1st Battalion attack, moved two hundred yards, lost contact, and had to pull back for protection as it was hit by heavy frontal and flanking fire. Eight died and fourteen were wounded in an advance that had gained nothing, and only two Marines remained in the 1st Platoon. Determined to force a breakthrough, Platoon Sergeant Joseph R. Julian quickly established his platoon's guns in supporting positions. Then, acting on his own initiative, he moved forward alone against the nearest pillbox, and threw demolitions and white phosphorus grenades into it, killing two of the enemy and driving the remaining five out into the adjoining trench system.

Seizing a discarded rifle, Julian jumped into the trench and dispatched the five before they could escape. Intent on wiping out all resistance he went back, picked up more explosives and, now accompanied by another Marine, again charged the fortifications and knocked out two more cave positions. Then he opened fire on the one remaining pillbox with a bazooka, pumped four rounds into it and completely destroyed it before he was mortally wounded by a burst of enemy fire. He was awarded the Medal of Honor.

Private First Class James D. LaBelle, a member of the Weapons Company, 27th Marines, also won the Medal of Honor at the cost of his life. LaBelle was filling a gap in the front lines when a grenade landed in his foxhole. He shouted a warning to his companions and dived on the grenade, absorbing the charge and saving the other Marines from injury.

On D plus 18 Lieutenant Colonel Duryea, commanding LT 1/27, was badly wounded by an exploding land mine and Major William R. Tumbleston, his executive officer, took command. The same blast caught LT 2/27's Major Antonelli and three of his officers while they conferred in the front lines. Although he was suffering from the effects of the blast, foreign particles of some kind imbedded in one eye, and a broken eardrum, Antonelli continued his reconnaissance of the front and refused to be evacuated until he had issued orders for resumption of the attack.

Sent to the Division hospital, Antonelli walked out and returned to his battalion, which was being heavily shelled, and stayed there until his regimental commander personally ordered him back to the hospital. The next day he was back at his command post. He stayed there during daylight for seven days until Colonel Wornham requested that he be evacuated from the island to prevent further injury. Major Gerald F. Russell took command of the 2d Battalion.

The war was coming close to General Kuribayashi personally. He complained to Tokyo that several hundred infantrymen with tanks were attacking nearby and that bombing and machine-gun firing against his command post was so fierce that he could not express himself.

"Before American forces landed on Iwo Jima," the Japanese general continued, "there were many trees around my headquarters, but now there is not even a wisp of grass remaining. The surface of the earth has changed completely and we can see numerous holes of bombardments."

In the hope that troops might overrun the last Japanese positions behind the shock of heavy fire, every artillery battalion on the island massed fire on the pocket on D plus 20. In all, ten thousand rounds of artillery poured into the position, and elements of the Division jumped off against this fortress only to be hit hard and stopped. Again the terrain had nullified the effects of artillery fire.

An hour later, the 5th Division, with two regiments abreast, joined the attack. CT 28, all battalions on line, drove for the ridge line which overlooked the gorge across its front, but two attacks netted thirty yards and 143 officers and men killed or wounded. On the right of CT 28, CT 27, with LT 1/26 attached, made two hundred yards and continued its methodical destruction of cave positions but lost a battalion in the process. LT 2/27, worn, casualty-ridden, no longer employable as a front-line battalion, had to be pulled out and was not used in attack again during the campaign.

Lieutenant Colonel Robertson's 3d Battalion had drawn the day's toughest assignment—the capture of high ground on which the enemy had once had radar installations, since destroyed. Land mines threatened each forward step and made it impossible for tanks to lead or even follow the infantry. Company G, heading a frontal assault, was doused by a shower of exploding knee-mortar shells, but still drove to the top of the hill only to be met by scores of grenade-throwing Japanese and literally blown off the high ground. The Marines fought back with mortars, and two 60mms arched hundreds of shells into the enemy positions on the hill. Again G Company attacked the deadly sugar-loaf to the front, and again fell back before knee mortars and grenades. Then Private First Class Norman L. Smith and Corporal Walther S. Yancy inched their way to the top. Spotting a ravine crammed full of Japanese mortarmen, they sent word back to their own mortar crews. Several hundred more shells rained down into the ravine.

The third assault drew no enemy fire at all and brought the 3d Battalion to the top of the hill to stay. Marines now held the highest ground in the area and from it could see Kitano Point (Iwo's northernmost point) clearly.

Chow line: "If it comes in a can, we've got it!"

Company I of LT 3/27, which had spent the day blowing caves and pillboxes, dug in for the night with three platoons in line and its command post behind the center platoon. After dark, supposedly cleared caves began to disgorge Japanese who plagued the weary Marines all night. Machine guns could not stop the infiltration, nor could rifles or grenades. The enemy bored through and hit the command post section, which fought back with carbines. After a bitter, confused scrap in the dark, company headquarters "re-treated" into the front lines. Half of the unit's machine guns were turned around and the Marines fought in both directions at once. At daybreak, twenty enemy dead lay behind the lines and nineteen out in front.

The Division's D plus 21 attack met with heavy resistance all along the front. CT 28 continued to reduce Japanese positions, but there was not a great deal of ground gained, in spite of the fact that every available supporting weapon—37mm guns, tanks, half-tracks, and rockets—was brought into play. Japanese faded from position to position to escape knockout blows, and nowhere did there appear to be a shortage of enemy weapons or men to man them. Occasionally the Japanese crowded Marine lines to get out from under artillery fire, and these close-in troops all but annihilated two machine-gun squads of LT 3/28 and turned the guns against the Marines.

CT 27 on the right, working behind tanks and flame-throwing tanks gained about two hundred yards and knocked out eighteen pillboxes.

While this was going on, artillery and planes continued to blast the enemy's rear positions where they could do the most good. One plane dropped a 500-pound bomb into a cave entrance, and created a violent explosion that jetted smoke from other cave entrances three hundred yards away.

At noon the 3d Division reported that organized resistance in its zone had ended, but the 4th Division was still chewing at a pocket of its own without much luck.

► FLANK ATTACK

THE RIDGE LINE on northern Iwo ran from the center of the island west to the sea, and the eastern half of the island was, to all intents and purposes, secure, all of which invited a flank attack toward the sea. On D plus 22 Division ordered CT 27 to wheel to the west and attack down the corridors while CT 28 continued its northern attack.

The attack, starting in the morning, made good progress. Company B, LT 1/27, paced by tanks, had picked up about three hundred yards by noon and had moved into flat country when heavy fire came down on it from the sides of a gorge and the advance stopped. LT 2/27's H Company also moved into comparatively level ground and picked up seventy-five yards through a gully which had stopped its men the day before.

In front of CT 28, the Japanese still manned the long ridge which had stopped the Marines before. The south (near) slope was gradual but cut up by small draws that ran parallel to the ridge line, and the crest bristled with pillboxes and spider holes. The north (reverse) slope, between forty and seventy feet high, was pocked with caves.

At this point Headquarters decided to try out a new weapon, the 7.2-inch rocket designed to be fired in battery from the backs of tanks. There had not been time to mount them before the operation, and ordnance men had now mounted them on sleds which tanks towed to concealed positions near the front and facing a strong enemy pocket. The launching crews fired about a hundred projectiles in two minutes, and these churned the target area into a mass of flame, smoke and rubble so fearsome that observers felt every Japanese in it must surely have been killed.

Not so. When CT 28's 1st and 3d Battalions followed up the barrage with an assault they were hit and stopped by heavy fire from Japanese positions which had felt the full force of the rockets' impact. General Rockey later remarked ruefully. "It was all noise and no damage."

Later in the day LT 2/28 skirted a pocket of resistance and gained a hundred yards as D Company fought its way to the ridge line overlooking the gorge. Company D was now a company in name only, having been reduced, along with most companies in the combat team, to the size of a rifle platoon, and any further attack in the immediate area was suspended. Among the casualties in the last attack had been Private First Class George B. Mercer, last remaining man of the original four who had scaled Suribachi, and Lieutenant Byron E. Fisher, who was killed by a sniper as he led his platoon over the crest of the ridge. Fisher had been one of the combat team's most gallant platoon leaders.

The Japanese contrived to shoot down one of VMO-5's planes during the afternoon of D plus 22, the first that had been destroyed. It fell two hundred yards inside the Japanese lines and both the pilot and observer were lost. The Japanese usually fired at single planes over their lines, although they seldom fired when the planes flew in groups. Of the five Division air observers, two were killed and one was wounded, and the five among them flew 113 missions over the Japanese lines and logged 318 hours in the air.

► D PLUS 23

ENEMY RESISTANCE was light on March 14, and it became evident that the Japanese had little left but machine guns, knee mortars, grenades and rifles. CT 26 took over the center line, bringing all three regiments abreast again. CT 28 held its positions on the south side of the rocky gorge, and CT 27 along with CT 26's right elements gained up to six hundred yards.

LT 3/26 launched a daylight attack which gained steadily after armored dozers had hacked out paths in front of the lines so that much-needed armor could move. Battered LT 2/26, averaging seventy men per company, picked up four hundred yards.

During this attack Private Franklin E. Sigler won the Medal of Honor for gallantry at the risk of his life. He had voluntarily taken command of a rifle squad when the squad leader was hit, and moved out ahead of his squad to charge an enemy gun which had held up his company. Attacking with grenades he wiped out the emplacement and killed the crew, but was almost immediately taken under fire from emplacements above him. He scaled the rocks which hid these emplacements, and made a furious one-man attack in which he was severely wounded. He got back to his squad, but refused to be evacuated and directed heavy machine-gun and rocket barrages on the cave entrances, meanwhile carrying three Marine casualties to safety in spite of his own painful wounds. He was finally ordered to the rear.

On the right of the Division line, Companies A and C of LT 1/27 gained between two and three hundred yards. During the engagement, Lieutenant William H. Van Beest, last original officer in C Company, was killed and Major Tumbleston, the battalion commander, badly wounded and evacuated. Major William H. Kennedy, 3d Battalion operations officer, took command of 1st Battalion.

On the far right of the Division line, LT 3/27 moved ahead six hundred yards and enabled the combat team to shorten its lines by three hundred yards.

Evidence that the artillery was busy on Iwo. Tons of shell casings and ammunition containers cover the 13th's area.

Wretched with fear and pleading for his life, a wounded Japanese soldier is hauled from a blasted cave.

All along the 5th Division zone, close air support and naval gunfire had to be secured. The front lines were so irregular, the area remaining to be captured so small, and the terrain so broken that fire from tanks and halftracks replaced artillery for daylight close support.

► DEAD OR DEAD TIRED

D PLUS 24 saw advances up to six hundred yards, advances that put CT 27 on ground that commanded the rest of the island in its zone. Early in the attack the 2d Battalion had launched an abortive attack, stopped as much by fatigue as enemy fire. Major Rea, however, reorganized his men and, moving well to the front, led the battalion in an attack that finally overran much of the high ground the combat team took that day. The next day, the battalion was relieved; its fighting on Iwo Jima was over.

LT 3/26 finally reached the mouth of the gorge that had stalled CT 28, the gorge where the enemy was thickest and where the last battle would be fought. Its companies could not be resupplied or evacuate their wounded during the day, but they found that they could do both successfully after dark, and held their ground.

That the Division still moved forward at all was a credit to the men and their leaders, but the fearful strain of days in the line was showing up in every unit. Men were getting careless, exposing themselves to fire when they were tired. Too, many of the men now were replacements, men who fought gallantly and brought credit to themselves and the Division, but who were not, nevertheless, as highly trained as the Division's original men had been and for that reason probably took slightly heavier losses.

Division, however, made every effort to keep up morale. The wounded were taken out and the dead buried as rapidly as possible. Baked goods and fruit juices went to the forward units every day, as did mail and copies of The Spearhead, the paper put out by the Division G-2 section. New clothing issues went forward, and free cigarettes, candy and toilet articles were distributed every day in the lines, while the Red Cross took care of toilet article issues to the wounded. Engineers tapped a sulphur rock well for hot showers, and as many men as could be spared were sent back to the beaches to swim in the surf.

Nevertheless, Iwo Jima remained an unclean, evil little island, an island that these men would never forget, however much they would have liked to.

► BEGINNING OF THE END

ELEMENTS of the 3d Marine Division passed through CT 27 on D plus 25 and reached Kitano Point early in the afternoon, but the 5th's attack against the major Japanese pocket was only partly successful. CT 27 and LT 2/26 had been pulled out of the lines and were in process of being reorganized as a single battalion under Lieutenant Colonel Robertson. While this was taking place CT 26, with LT 3/28 attached, attacked with three battalions abreast and advanced painfully through the rocky country. Major Tolson A. Smoak had taken command of 3/28 when Lieutenant Colonel Shepard was hospitalized on D plus 23.

The tactics of the advance now followed a definite pattern. Infantry first moved out and drew fire to locate the enemy. Armored dozers then blasted a path for the tanks from which they could fire on the already located positions. Flame-throwing tanks then burned out and machine-gunned them, allowing the infantry to move up. As soon as the positions were secure, engineers came up and demolished them.

That morning the 13th Marines, all four battalions firing, laid down their last preparation of the campaign. They received orders in the afternoon to secure and wait for embarkation orders. In the twenty-six days it had been ashore, Colonel Waller's regiment had fired 129,962 rounds of ammunition.

The 4th Marine Division had cleared the last of the enemy from its zone and was already beginning to embark on transports off the eastern beaches. At dusk of March 16 (D plus 25) Japanese resistance was officially declared ended, and, for all practical purposes, it was. Still ahead of the 5th Marine Division, though, was the last pocket of resistance, and there were still scattered enemy in other parts of the island. These could have no effect on the outcome of the battle, but somebody had to get rid of them, and Marines were going to be killed and wounded doing it.

► INTELLIGENCE

THAT DAY H COMPANY, LT 3/28, captured an enemy sergeant-major who described a cave large enough to hold an entire Japanese battalion, and said that about five hundred Japanese remained in the whole sector.

"Kuribayashi," he insisted, "was with them."

Kuribayashi was indeed with them. That day he addressed this message to his surviving men (with a carbon to Tokyo): "The battle situation has come to the last moment. I want my surviving officers and men to go out and attack the enemy tonight. Each troop: Go out simultaneously at midnight and attack the enemy until the last. You all have devoted yourself to His Majesty, the Emperor. Don't think of yourself. I am always at the head of you all."

(This attack never occurred, however, and five days later Kuribayashi radioed that he and four hundred men still were fighting.)

Twelve officers and eleven enlisted linguists under Major John C. Erskine questioned prisoners taken by the Division. Examiner teams operated down to battalion level where they sorted documents, reported on captured enemy equipment, and approved souvenirs. The interrogators found that most prisoners knew only the dispositions in their own sectors and were not too clear on those. They shed considerable light, however, on Kuribayashi's tactical plans for a cave-by-cave defense and the fact that he had vetoed all plans for mass counterattacks.

Prisoners also revealed that the Japanese knew Iwo Jima was to be invaded, that they knew the units which were to make the landing, and that the appearance of the landing force on February 19, 1945, came as no surprise to them. Final entries in the notebook of an unidentified Japanese soldier read, "The task force will take four days to arrive at Iwo Jima from Saipan, 1 battleship, 18 destroyers and cruisers, 40 transports left Hawaii (? and 5th MarDiv) 3d and 4th Mar. Div., 1 Brigade."

Further evidence that the enemy knew the date of the landing was provided by a captured Japanese officer who said that his troops did not man their field positions defending Airfield No. 1 until February 14.

General Kuribayashi's code clerk was captured during the operation, and told interrogators that most information on American movements came from submarine reports. This prisoner was considered so important that he was flown directly to Pearl Harbor.

► SURRENDER APPEAL

THE USE OF PROPAGANDA to persuade the Japanese to surrender was a pretty hopeless proposition from the beginning. Most of the Japanese had made up their minds when Iwo Jima was invaded that they were going to die defending it, and the Japanese mind was always notoriously hard to change in these matters. The Japanese realized, too, that the close quarters and the fury of the Marine attack made it very doubtful whether a man who came out in the open and tried to surrender would succeed before somebody polished him off. Finally, the terrain and the cave system of defense made it difficult to reach the enemy with either speakers or leaflets.

Rations for seventy thousand Marines on Iwo form huge rear-area QM dumps.

Marines hug the sides of a rockstrewn gully in The Slot while a tankdozer butts its way through a clutter of rocks.

Nevertheless, pilots dropped leaflets from the air and the artillery fired shells loaded with surrender passes into the Japanese lines. Although General Kuribayashi had ordered instant death for any man caught with one of them, there was evidence that these leaflets influenced eight of the Division's sixty-two prisoners.

When, on D plus 26, G-2 received word from the front that the remaining enemy were willing to surrender, Division decided an all-out effort was at least worth trying. Marines ceased firing, and prisoners, language officers, and Nisei interpreters appealed to the Japs over loudspeaker systems to cease fighting for a lost cause. There was absolutely no response, and firing began again. This process was repeated every day for three days, but never produced results.

General Kuribayashi took note of it, however, and radioed Tokyo: "The Americans advised us to surrender by loudspeaker, but we only laughed at this childish trick and did not set ourselves against them."

► TO THE DEATH

AS THE 26TH MARINES eliminated the last enemy resistance in northwestern Iwo Jima and its 1st Battalion broke through to the sea, the only remaining Japanese-held ground—all in the 5th Division zone—was the gorge which CT 28 had been facing. It was eight hundred yards long from its inland approach to the western beach and seventy-five to five hundred yards wide, filled with jagged, rocky outcrops. Men moving through it would face heavy, accurate machine-gun and rifle fire from caves and spider holes in the cliffs and outcrops. (The Japanese decision to hold this ground to the end cost the 5th Marine Division four hundred more casualties.)

To crush this last resistance, General Rockey decided that CT 28 would hold its position on the southern lip of the gorge while CT 26 worked down it from the north and east. General Hermle, the ADC, moved into an observation post overlooking the gorge and General Rockey transferred to him operational control over all units in the area.

Japanese resistance on D plus 28 centered around an immense concrete structure near the eastern entrance to the gorge. It was surrounded by mutually supporting caves, and was absolutely impervious to tank shelling and demolition attempts with forty-pound shaped charges. Finally, Marines destroyed the surrounding positions and by-passed the emplacement, which was later destroyed, after tankdozers had closed off several air vents and a steel door, by more than four tons of explosives divided into five charges.

LT 1/26 spearheaded the attack down the gorge while other landing teams along with the 5th Pioneer Battalion hammered at its mouth or mopped up along either side. A motor transport detachment under Captain Samuel L. Slocum was detached from LT 1/28 and returned to its battalion after eight days of well performed duty with the infantry. In the course of LT 1/26's attack Lieutenant Colonel Pollock, its commander, was wounded and Major Albert V. K. Gary took command.

D plus 29 saw LTs 3/27 and 1/26 continue the attack down the gorge until G Company, 2/27, operating with two platoons and any specialists it could scrape up, ran into a knoll solidly held by the Japanese. The Japs opened up with a hand grenade barrage from caves cut into the sides of the knoll, and Captain James C. Brennan's Marines fought back in kind, emptying thirty-six cases of grenades during the afternoon and disposing of various of the enemy who charged the Marine lines with bombs and explosive charges strapped to their backs.

After dozers had cleared a path, flame-throwing tanks moved up and burned out the caves which were still occupied as G Company, minus seven killed and twenty-four wounded, fought its way to the top of the knoll. Before dark, however, the company moved back a short distance and dug in on more defensible ground.

While this battle was being fought LT 1/26's patrols, with engineers and tanks attached, had probed far down the gorge and killed about eighty Japanese in the process. During this operation one tank-dozer operator had nosed his machine down the gorge, plowing shut caves and scooping out paths for the tanks behind him. Suddenly a lone Japanese soldier carrying a satchel charge ran at the dozer with the very evident intention of blowing it up.

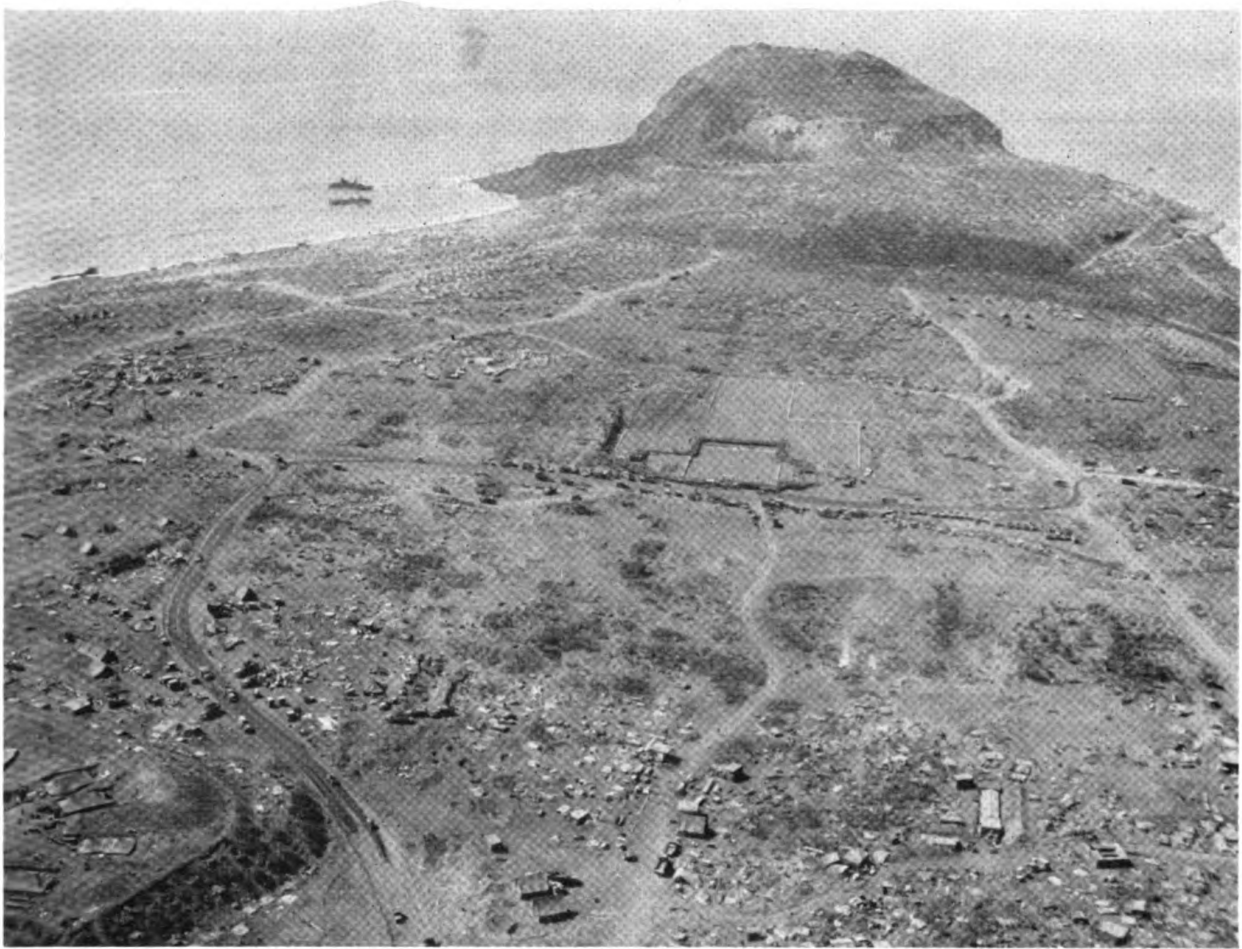

The operator swung sharply toward his assailant, raised the powerful dozer blade, paused, and dropped it, neatly cutting the Japanese in two. Then, as an astonished tank crew looked on, this Marine climbed from his machine and ambled over to the buttoned-up Sherman. Disregarding enemy fire he banged on the side of the tank until a disbelieving crew member answered him through a fire port.

"Did you see what that Nip tried to do to me?" he exclaimed. "That did it, brother, I'm finished!"

With that he ambled down the gorge through sniper-thick country until finally he reached the Marine front lines. Although tankmen had not recovered from the incident the next day the dozer operator had, and was again leading the fight against the last organized resistance on Iwo.

► BEHIND THE LINES

WHILE Marines fought this last-ditch battle in the northern part of the island, the southern end of Iwo Jima had changed. Everywhere were construction materials and huge stacks of supplies; crawling cranes and heavy steam shovels chugged at a thousand tasks, and bumper-to-bumper traffic on newly built roads raised a pall of volcanic sand which coated everything. Suribachi was capped by radar and other Air Corps installations, and at its base was a prisoner-of-war camp.

Tents and buildings have sprung up, Suribachi's face has changed. By late March Iwo had become an Army island.

Air Corps and garrison personnel tent camps had sprung up and transports and fighter planes crowded both airfields. Forty distressed B-29s which otherwise would have been lost had already landed on their way back from raids on the Empire. Iwo Jima was beginning to pay off its frightful cost.

Many Marines began to think the worst was over. Sailors from ships offshore began to appear in the rear of the beachhead, poking around wrecked pill-boxes (which was dangerous and prohibited by order) and dicker for souvenirs. The "visitors' day" sign was not up in one regimental area, however. Commanding officers ordered that anyone who was not fighting a war was to be put to work.

Shortly, a group of clean-shaven souvenir hunters under armed guard picked and shovelled away at a road. One member of the group especially was coming to a slow boil. After an hour of mixed digging and muttering he threw down his shovel and announced, "You can't do this. I'm a lieutenant (j.g.)." The Marine guard removed a dangling cigarette from the corner of his mouth, spat, and clicked back the bolt of his rifle. The group—at full strength—resumed its digging.

Then, for about an hour on the night of March 18, the island was the happiest spot on earth. Antiaircraft and other units in rear areas opened up a jubilant barrage with machine guns, antiaircraft guns, carbines, rifles and pistols. The war in Europe was over: Germany had quit fighting.

Then came the dismal truth.

An Army walkie-talkie operator, bored in his fox-hole, had decided to play "radio announcer" with a nearby companion.

Close by, inside a truck, another radioman was copying military messages sent from San Francisco.

Somehow the frequencies tangled and from the official operator's headset came:

"Germany has surrendered unconditionally."

The operator hurriedly passed this to his headquarters. Ten minutes later units all over the island and the ships offshore had the news.

"I think," the foxhole announcer later reported to his commanding officer, "I've done something wrong."

Corps headquarters had to declare, "Condition Red—enemy planes in the area," to stop the celebration.

Later all battalions in the line turned to repulsing infiltration attempts. Groups of Japanese with a high percentage of officers worked through the lines successfully and several company command posts were scenes of vicious hand-grenade battles. LT 1/28 killed forty-eight enemy troops who moved in close to their front lines; CT 26 accounted for sixteen others and took two prisoners.

The next morning, March 19, the 4th Division sailed for its rehabilitation camp on Maui. In the afternoon the Army's 147th Infantry Regiment, the island garrison force, arrived at Iwo Jima.

► END OF THE POCKET

CT 26, WITH LT 3/27 and 3/28 attached, attacked again on D plus 30 as 1/26 and 3/27 moved down the gorge while 3/28 held its positions. The enemy would not give ground and forced the Marines to eliminate them one by one. Many Japanese appeared dressed in Marine uniforms and firing M-1 rifles, which they seemed to prefer to their own.

Company D, 1/26, advanced two hundred yards down the gorge, but needed flame-throwing tanks to go farther. When it developed that there was no way to get them in, the company tried using portable flamethrowers until the Japanese shot the liquid out of the tanks. One operator was burned to death when his equipment was hit, and the other's life was saved by the narrowest of margins.

On the rim of the gorge LT 1/28 picked up forty yards to the edge of the cliff, and LT 2/28, after a patrol had killed twenty-five enemy riflemen and sealed fifteen caves in the morning, also moved up a hundred yards to the cliff's edge.

That night Kuribayashi sent his last message to Tokyo: "We have not eaten or drunk for five days, but our fighting spirit is still running high. We are going to fight bravely to the last."

There is evidence that—first and last—the General's men fought bravely. Of the 159 Japanese and 58 Korean prisoners taken by the entire landing force, 11 died and eighty-five per cent of the rest were wounded and needed medical care.

D plus 31 was a repetition of D plus 30, except that Marines gained more ground. LT 3/27 led the attack and, with tanks, dozer tanks, and flame-throwing tanks which had been gotten to them, gained about three hundred yards.

The backbone of enemy defenses in the gorge had been broken, but the 27th Marines was no longer in fighting condition, and the battered composite battalion which was all that was left of Colonel Wornham's regiment was relieved. As a matter of fact losses had been so heavy that the average battalion, which had landed with 36 officers and 885 men, now mustered 16 officers and 300 men, including the hundreds of replacements who had been funneled in since D-day. Many small units were now commanded by corporals and privates first class.

LT 3/26 and LT 3/28 moved off down the gorge again on D plus 32, methodically mopping up, sealing caves, squeezing the Japanese into a smaller and smaller area. Finally, at 1045 on D plus 34 the gorge was declared secured. The job was finished.

Almost!

► BREAKTHROUGH

THE NIGHT OF MARCH 26 (D plus 35) was quiet until just before dawn. Then, without warning, a force of several hundred Japanese who apparently had been hiding in by-passed caves moved down from the north, apparently driving for the ships' loading area on the western beaches. As this force penetrated deep into the central island area, they overran the bivouacs of newly arrived Army Air Force units and Seabees (both were hard hit) and got into the bivouac area of the 5th Pioneer Battalion. On this unit fell the main burden of repelling the attack and destroying the Japanese troops.

As the Japanese attempted to move into C Company's bivouac Lieutenant Harry S. Martin quickly organized a firing line to check them. Determined to rescue several men trapped in a position overrun by the enemy, he defied intense fire to work his way to the surrounded Marines. Although wounded twice, Martin blasted the enemy troops who blocked his way, located the beleaguered men, and directed them into the Marine lines.

When four of the enemy occupied a machine-gun pit and began to toss grenades, the Lieutenant, armed only with a pistol, boldly charged the position and killed all of the occupants. Realizing that his few remaining Marines could not repulse another organized attack, he called on them to follow as he charged into the midst of the strong enemy force. He scattered and disorganized the Japanese in front of his position until he fell, mortally wounded by a grenade. Martin became the fourteenth 5th Division Marine to win the Medal of Honor on Iwo Jima. Only four, however, were alive.

After being driven back in C Company's area, the enemy renewed his efforts in the Air Corps bivouac area bordering on the south of the Pioneer Battalion. Captains George W. Ellis and Robert C. Munroe quickly organized all available personnel from Companies A and B, 5th Pioneer Battalion, and attacked this enemy force. After brief but bitter hand-to-hand fighting, all enemy soldiers were wiped out. Their dead numbered 223, 196 of whom fell in the Pioneer Battalion area. This Marine unit lost 9 killed and 31 wounded. The attack was not a Banzai charge but was carefully calculated to achieve maximum confusion and destruction before its inevitable annihilation. Many of the enemy soldiers were armed with U. S. carbines and BARs, and about forty carried swords, indicating a high percentage of officers and senior NCOs. The majority of the Japanese showed evidences of previous wounds. A POW taken by the 3d Division stated that General Kuribayashi and other senior officers were in the final attack force but examination of bodies, captured swords, and documents failed to confirm this. Kuribayashi's fate never was known.

The Price of Victory

THE 5th DIVISION buried 7,710 enemy dead, or more than half the 13,449 enemy interred on Iwo by the landing force. In addition an estimated 10,000 enemy dead were buried by the Japanese themselves or were sealed in caves during the advance of the three divisions. Iwo Jima, in turn, had cost the landing force 916 officer and 20,063 enlisted casualties (See Appendix for casualty data). Nearly five thousand men who had come ashore on the evil little island were not going to leave. Inside white picket fences tiny American flags fluttered beside each spotless white marker.

On March 21 the 5th Division cemetery had been formally dedicated. Commander Warren Cuthriell and other chaplains prayed, and General Rockey added his tribute to the dead. As the ceremony continued, someone else began to talk:

"This is the grimmest, and surely the holiest task we have faced since D-day. Here before us lie the bodies of comrades and friends. Men who until yesterday or last week laughed with us, joked with us, trained with us. Men who were on the same ships with us, and went over the side with us as we prepared to hit the beaches of this island."

The speaker was Lieutenant Roland B. Gittelsohn, USN, a 5th Division chaplain.

"It is not easy to do so," he continued. "Some of us have buried our closest friends here. We saw these men killed before our very eyes. Any one of us might have died in their places. Indeed, some of us are alive and breathing at this very moment only because men who lie here beneath us had the courage and strength to give their lives for ours. To speak in memory of such men as these is not easy. . . ."

"No, our poor power of speech can add nothing to what these men and the other dead of our Division who are not here have already done. All that we even hope to do is follow their example. To show the same selfless courage in peace that they did in war. To swear that by the grace of God and the stubborn strength and power of human will, their sons and ours shall never suffer these pains again. These men have done their job well. They have paid the ghastly price of freedom. . . .

"We dedicate ourselves, first, to live together in peace the way they fought and are buried in this war. Here lie men who loved America because their ancestors generations ago helped in her founding and other men who loved her with equal passion because they themselves or their own fathers escaped from oppression to her blessed shores. Here lie officers and men, Negroes and whites, rich men and poor—together. . . . Theirs is the highest and purest democracy.

"Any man among us, the living, who fails to understand that will thereby betray those who lie here dead. Whoever of us lifts his hand in hate against a brother . . . makes of this ceremony and of the bloody sacrifice it commemorates an empty, hollow mockery. . . .

"To one thing more do we consecrate ourselves in memory of those who sleep beneath these crosses and stars. We shall not foolishly suppose, as did the last generation of America's fighting men, that victory on the battlefield will automatically guarantee the triumph of Democracy at home. This war, with all its frightful heartache and suffering, is but the beginning of our generation's struggle for democracy. . . .

"Thus do we memorialize those who, having ceased living with us, now live within us. Thus do we consecrate ourselves, the living, to carry on the struggle they began. Too much pain and heartache has fertilized the earth on which we stand. We here solemnly swear: This shall not be in vain! Out of this, and from the suffering and sorrow of those who mourn this, will come—we promise—the birth of a new freedom for the sons of men everywhere."

The flag rose, then descended to half-mast. Taps echoed across the volcanic ash dune that was Iwo Jima.

During the next five days as units were pulled out of the line or secured from their combat mission other groups of tired, disheveled, battle-sick Marines came to say "goodbye." Again men who had faced death each minute for thirty-six days bowed their heads in prayer or walked silently through the cemetery.

After special unit services, groups formed silently and trudged to the beach. There they boarded landing craft which took them to waiting transports.

Few looked back as Iwo faded from sight.

Leaving Iwo. Marines board landing craft which will take them to transports for the return voyage to Hawaii.

Return to Hawaii

BATTERED 5th DIVISION MARINES automatically lolled into a set shipboard routine of "sack time" and chow lines. Sleep, sleep, and more sleep gradually dissolved the aches and pains, and Navy food began to flesh out men who had lived too long on combat rations. Shaves, showers and haircuts improved morale, and there were signs that these men who had fought so long that senses and emotions were dulled, might come back to life.

Too, the troops had reacted enthusiastically to the news—announced on Iwo Jima—that the 5th would not be rehabilitated on Guam but would return to its former camp in Hawaii. Even the dusty lava fields of Camp Tarawa would be welcome, and the thoughts of liberty in Hilo, Honokaa, Hawi, and Kona seemed more appealing than at any time during the initial five-month tour of overseas duty.

Lonely, little Eniwetok was the first landfall for Marines who had left Iwo Jima six days before, but the two-day pause to refuel the convoy reacted as an irritating delay in the voyage "home." The hot strips of white coral surrounding the atoll's huge lagoon had little eye appeal, and the once-curious scars of war tended only to remind the men of a battle they hoped to forget.

Aboard ship, officers labored over recommendations for decorations and awards for their heroic men. It was not a simple task, for every man who fought on the island was a hero, and besides, it was impossible to give full credit to everyone who deserved his country's special recognition; many officers had taken their silent wish to decorate their men with them to their graves.

There was other work to be done. Action reports, describing every phase of the operation, had to be written, and plans had to be made for the movements back to camp, the rehabilitation program, and future training schedules.

On April 12, Division Headquarters and the 28th Marines arrived at Hilo, and immediately began unloading and moving men and equipment to Camp Tarawa. Other regiments with their attached units paused briefly at Pearl Harbor, and after liberty ashore, moved a day apart to the "Big Island" for unloading.

As the 5th Division Leathernecks filed down gangplanks, many of them broke into smiles at finding themselves once more on friendly soil. A few still wore light bandages, souvenirs of the bitter fighting on Iwo; others were weighted down with captured enemy weapons, Japanese flags, and other trophies. On the docks a Navy band played and the Red Cross distributed candy, cigarettes, and ice cream. As the Marines passed through Hilo automobile horns began to blare and civilians quickly collected in cheering groups. Shop owners closed their stores and school children waved excitedly all along the Division's homeward route.

► OPERATION SHAKE-DOWN

NOW "OPERATION SHAKE-DOWN" began, starting with an extensive liberty program that used every recreational facility within reach. Then the Division went to work overhauling equipment, absorbing replacements, and completing a multitude of tactical and administrative reports. All of this, of course, went on at once as the 5th Division again settled down in its Hawaiian encampment.

While the Division was at Iwo, a huge outdoor theater called "Kama Rock" had been erected in the 26th Marines' area. Here Marines saw a series of stage shows: "Ray Anthony," a submarine base variety show; "Shape Away," "Swing in Cadence" and "Take a Break," all Army Special Service shows; "Girl Crazy," a Hollywood variety show; and Dick Jurgens' Marine Variety Show. "The Man Who Came to Dinner," starring Moss Hart, played three nights at the Kamuela USO.

Two shows each night packed the camp's five movie theaters. Good or bad pictures made little difference in the attendance—movie critics had ceased to exist. One night as several Marines walked toward their theater no member of the group could remember the name or the cast of the picture they were about to see.

"But what's it all about?" persisted one man.

"Women," answered another. There was no need for further talk on the subject.

Five new Red Cross huts, one in each area, had been built and equipped with radios, phonographs, books, magazines, writing materials, and, best of all, hostesses. Coffee and doughnuts were served in the afternoon and at night.

The Kamuela USO club inaugurated a lively program of dances, movies, and canteen service, and other clubs at Honokaa, Kealahou-Kona, Hawi, and Hilo went all-out to arrange a rousing welcome for the returning Marines. Coconut Island in Hilo Harbor became the scene of swimming parties, athletic events and beach *luau*s.

Maume and Kawaiha beaches had added barbecue pits, athletic facilities, and post exchange branches. Basketball courts at the Kamuela gymnasium were opened to Marines, and the newly christened Iwo Jima Baseball Field was crowded with baseball and softball games. Deep-sea fishing parties packed the Division sampan.

Three-day island tours took in the Old Royal Palace at Kailua, the Kona Inn, Kealahou Bay (where Captain Cook landed in 1799 and was killed by natives) the City of Refuge, the Volcano House and the Chain of Craters at Kilauea.

► SENATE RESOLUTION

RETURNING MARINES were welcomed everywhere. Official praise came from the Senate of the Territory of Hawaii, which adopted the following resolution:

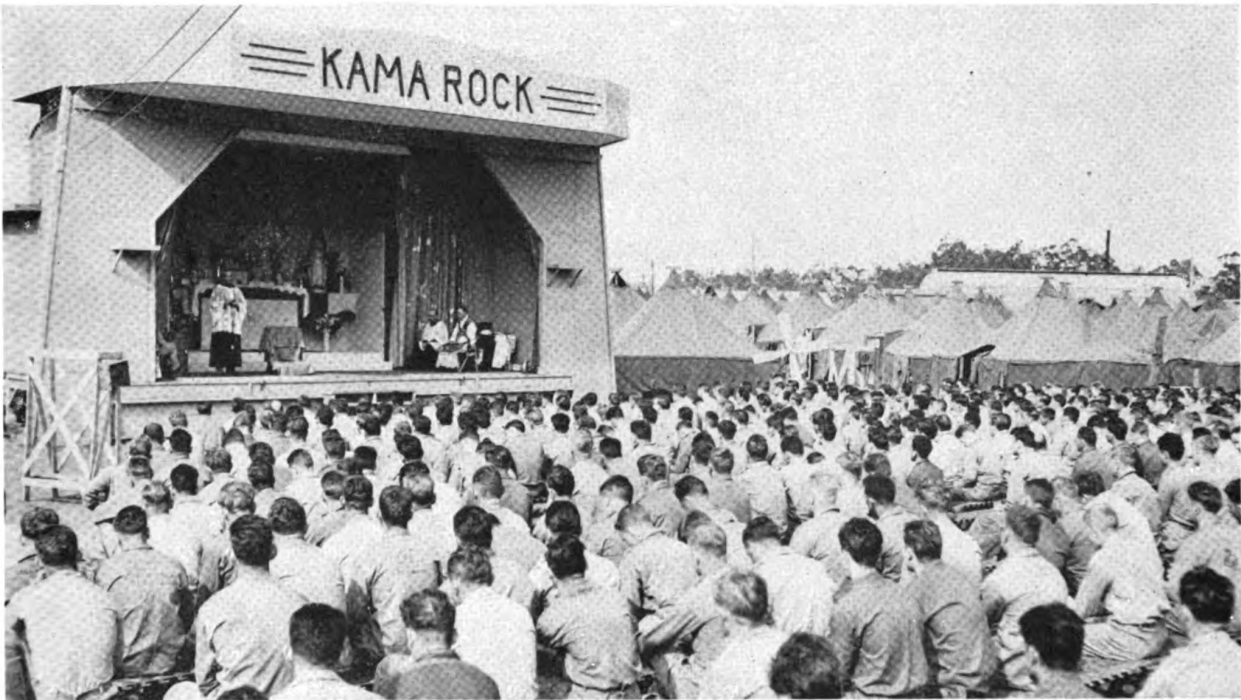

WHEREAS, In the long and glorious history of the United States Marine Corps one epic scene of valor succeeds another; and

WHEREAS, In all that glorious history, the Marines have never fought with greater valor or contempt for their own lives and safety than in the conquest of Iwo Jima; and

WHEREAS, Not merely their fabulous courage and fortitude, but the immense importance of their conquest to the speedy victory over the enemy, commands the respect and gratitude of the American people; and

WHEREAS, The Fifth Division of the United States Marine Corps is an old friend of the people of the Territory and particularly of the island of Hawaii; and has now returned to rest and recuperate on Hawaii; Now, Therefore,

BE IT RESOLVED by the Senate of the Twenty-Third Session of the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii that the heartfelt welcome of the Senate and of the People of Hawaii be extended to the officers and men of the Fifth Division of the United States Marine Corps upon their return to the Island of Hawaii after their magnificent part in the conquest of Iwo Jima; and

BE IT FURTHER RESOLVED that copies of this resolution be sent to Major General Keller E. Rockey, the Commanding Officer of said Fifth Division, to General A. A. Vandegrift, United States Marine Corps, to Admiral of the Fleet Chester W. Nimitz, and to the Honorable Secretary of the Navy.

In April Commandant Vandegrift visited Camp Tarawa and praised the Division for its heroism. At the same time Secretary of the Navy James Forrestal wrote to Colonel Liversedge:

"I was going ashore on Iwo the morning that your Marines raised the flag on Suribachi. It was an unforgettable sight. My congratulations. The country, as always, is very proud of the Marine Corps."

Brigadier General A. W. Kissner, USA, of the XXI Bomber Command on Saipan wrote in April to General Rockey:

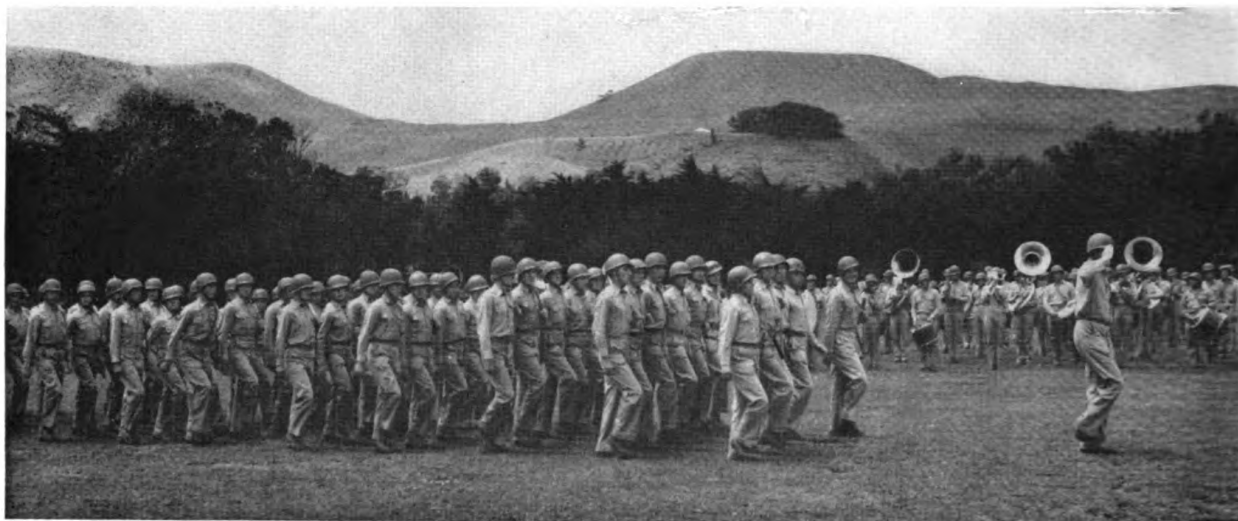

"Inasmuch as the officers and men of your command played so vital a role in the securing of Iwo Jima, I am sure you will have a personal satisfaction in knowing that to date more than 300 B-29s have made emergency landings there. "As a modest token of the respect and appreciation of the great contribution made by the 5th Marine Division in taking Iwo, during which you overcame difficulties with heroism that is a further credit to the superb record of the Marine Corps, we desire to name a new B-29 Superfortress for the 5th Marine Division and to inscribe on this plane the division insignia and battle name. We shall take considerable pride in the opportunity to dedicate the Superfortress selected and the missions it will fly over the Japanese Empire to the 5th Marine Division.”

FMFPAC inspection teams soon visited the Division and recommended the release of new equipment and replacement of items lost in combat. The 13th Marines, operating under a new allowance table, increased its fire power by turning in the 75mm howitzers of its 4th Battalion for 155s. The 1st and 4th Battalions exchanged their numerical designations during the shuffle.

The Division had barely settled down at Camp Tarawa when it received notice of its next combat assignment:¹ an assault against the Asiatic mainland. The target was the China coast in the Chusan Archipelago which adjoined the Ningpo Peninsula. On May 28, 1945, however, Division was told that this landing had been indefinitely postponed, but this postponement was followed almost immediately by a probable readiness date of September 1 for a direct assault on Southern Kyushu in the heart of the Japanese Empire. The 5th Division, as part of V Corps, was to be attached to the Sixth Army then based in the Philippines.

The stepped-up field training undertaken for the job ahead took into account lessons learned at Iwo Jima, but because of the large number of replacements, it was necessary to start again with individual training, then shift progressively to small-unit problems, landing-team and combat-team training, and, finally, Division maneuvers. Schools were established in mines and demolitions, intelligence, communications, chemical warfare, epidemic control, and other subjects. In order to prepare service units for probable infantry duty, companies of the Pioneer and Motor Transport Battalions were attached to regiments for an infantry refresher course. All phases of training emphasized assault platoon exercises and infantry-engineer coordination.

Several times each week the built-up Spearhead Division displayed its smartness and snap during parades which were usually highlighted by the presentation of decorations. Members of the 5th Division received 1,213 awards for heroic or meritorious service on Iwo Jima. In addition, 95 men received letters of commendation which entitled them to wear the green-and-white Commendation Ribbon, and several hundred others received commendations in writing from the Division Commander.

Ninety-four 5th Division Marines were awarded the Navy Cross, 39 of them posthumously. Gen. Rockey won the Distinguished Service Medal and General Hermle was among the Navy Cross winners. Three hundred thirty-seven Marines won the Silver Star, 79 of whom had lost their lives in the process. Division personnel also won 11 awards of the Legion of Merit; 9 were awarded the Distinguished Flying Cross; 3 won the Navy and Marine Corps Medal; 736 earned the Bronze Star; and 8 were awarded the Air Medal. Later the entire Division was awarded the Presidential Unit Citation.

In June important personnel changes took place in the Division. Chief of Staff Robinson was promoted to brigadier general and detailed as Assistant Division Commander, relieving General Hermle, who became assistant island commander at Guam. Colonel Gally became Chief of Staff until Colonel Clarence R. Wallace arrived from the 2d Division.

On June 25 General Rockey was detached from the Division to command III Amphibious Corps, and Major General Bourke—the 5th's first ADC—took command of the Division the same day.

Planning and training for OPERATION OLYMPIC—the landing on Japan—continued through June and July of 1945. The Division's tentative mission called for either an assault landing or employment as a reserve unit, and nine battalion landing teams were therefore formed, each one capable of storming ashore at any stage of the operation. Artillery and tanks also trained to operate under Division control so they could land on short notice over any designated beach.

During July General Bourke and his staff developed drafts of the Division operations plan and maintained close liaison with Corps headquarters on Maui. Planning officers knew that mountainous Japan would be difficult for both fighting and supply and that the Division would be in for a long, hard campaign with the added possibility that units would be widely separated and fighting independently.

During the summer of 1945, all battalion landing teams went through amphibious exercises at Maume Beach. As planning progressed and as the Division received more definite instructions on its employment, it conducted regimental and division problems that pointed up the probable scheme of maneuver. More and more stress was laid on assault of fortified positions, village fighting, and mines and demolitions. All of this training served, too, to build self-confidence and initiative in the men, and teamwork in the units.

Meanwhile a very serious water shortage developed at camp, and Marines had to replace daily showers with ocean dips until the 31st Seabees, working around the clock for forty days, could build a 13-million-gallon reservoir. Ocean swimming in the warm Pacific continued even after the drought ended as Division set up another combat swimming program at Maume Beach. Marines learned to swim longer distances and to keep afloat in rough water in order to prevent mass panic and loss of life in case of disaster at sea.

Detailed planning and more complex training maneuvers for OPERATION OLYMPIC were well under way when on August 10, 1945, a rumor spread through Camp Tarawa. The city of Hiroshima had been destroyed by a single bomb. Bigger and better rumors followed: This had been an atomic bomb twenty thousand times more powerful than TNT; it had killed a hundred thousand Japanese and spread panic through all of Japan. This scuttlebutt turned out to be true. Official communiqués in The Spearhead and Honolulu newspapers and radio broadcasts all confirmed it.

Mixed excitement and skepticism gripped the camp, heightened two days later when the atomic bombing of Nagasaki was announced. Then came reports of peace feelers from the enemy.

Was Japan going to quit? Every member of the 5th Division (faced with the prospect of an early assault landing on the Empire) prayed that she would. On August 14 Japan surrendered unconditionally. The news spread quickly and "Spearhead" Marines let go, but the outburst of whooping, back-slapping, impromptu parades and "beer busts" stopped sooner than anyone expected. The surrender news was anticlimactic—everyone had assured himself earlier that the fighting was about over.

Men, for the most part, calmed down quickly and tried to grasp what the end of the war really meant to them. Tent-row conversation centered on the subject of going home, but this was squelched immediately by the "very official" news that the 5th Division would participate in the occupation of Japan.

Information on this operation was fragmentary and changed rapidly. Within twelve days after the surrender of Japan, the Division was forced to complete all preparations for movement to Hilo and be embarked. Only six days were allotted to load forty-three ships of all types, and detailed planning had to be done after embarkation. Initial operation plans, readied within a week, called for an assault-type landing to meet any eventuality.

On August 27 the 5th embarked on Transport Squadron 22 for Pearl Harbor. After four days of staff conferences with Corps and Navy representatives it sailed on September 1 for Saipan.

On September 2, representatives of the Japanese government and the Allied powers met aboard the battleship Missouri in Tokyo Bay to sign the instrument of surrender. The text follows:

1. We, acting by command of and in behalf of the Emperor of Japan, the Japanese government and the Japanese Imperial General Headquarters, hereby accept provisions in the declaration issued by the heads of the governments of the United States, China and Great Britain, July 26, 1945, at Potsdam, and subsequently adhered to by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, which four powers are hereafter referred to as the Allied Powers.

officials to obey and enforce all proclamations, orders and directives deemed by the Supreme Commander for the Allied Powers to be proper to effectuate this surrender, and issued by him or under his authority, and we direct all such officials to remain at their posts, and to continue to perform their noncombatant duties unless specifically relieved by him or under his authority.

6. We hereby undertake for the Emperor, the Japanese government and their successors to carry out the provisions of the Potsdam Declaration in good faith, and to issue whatever orders and take whatever action may

7. We hereby command the Japanese Imperial Government and the Japanese Imperial General Headquarters at once to liberate all Allied prisoners of war and civilian internees now under Japanese control and to provide for their protection, care, maintenance and immediate transportation to places as directed.

8. The authority of the Emperor and the Japanese government to rule the state shall be subject to the Supreme Commander for the Allied Powers who will take such steps as he deems proper to effectuate these terms of surrender.

Training in occupation duties was stepped up aboard ship. Instructors particularly stressed personal appearance and conduct, customs and courtesies, Japanese history, psychology, Japanese words and phrases, and briefing for the occupation. Troops were thoroughly schooled in the nature of the operation, the Division's mission, responsibilities of individuals, and the conditions under which weapons would be used.

Planning continued en route as the situation in Japan developed. It seemed probable that there would be no resistance and the original plans, which had envisaged opposed landings, were modified. Assault-landing plans, however, were kept ready.

At Saipan, final conferences were held with Corps and 2d Marine Division. The Army 32d Division, which at the last moment replaced the 3d Marine Division, also was represented. At dusk on September 16, TransRon 22, carrying Corps headquarters and the 5th Division, sailed for Japan. The 2d Division, which was to land at Nagasaki and occupy southern and central Kyushu, prepared to follow within forty-eight hours.

Arrival in Japan

AT EARLY DAWN of September 22, 1945, seven months and three days after the assault on Iwo Jima, the 5th Marine Division arrived in its transports off northwestern Kyushu, the southernmost of the four large islands that form the country of Japan. As the ships began to twist from the open sea through narrow land-locked channels into sheltered bays, the Leathernecks of the 5th saw Japan for the first time. It is a green and mountainous land and it seemed untouched by war. Gray mists parted over it to disclose the neatly graded and extensively cultivated terraces climbing from the water's edge to the tops of the steep hillsides.

Two days before this Lieutenant Colonel Kenyth A. Damke, the 5th Division inspector, and Major Erskine, the senior Japanese linguist, had landed in the port of Sasebo with a Corps reconnaissance party. Later on the morning of the 22d they came back to the 5th Division headquarters ship to make their report. They said that the Japanese cooperation was excellent but that the city was a shambles and in a very insanitary condition. While this and other detailed information was relayed from ship to ship, the convoy nosed on into Sasebo's huge inner harbor. Crowding the rails, Marines of the 5th saw clusters of ships riding at anchor, ships of two navies. Sleek, battle-trim U.S. men-of-war of the Pacific Fleet stood to proudly in the center of the harbor, covering the sprawling mountain-locked city with their guns. Here at Sasebo was Japan's third largest naval base and in rock-bound inlets along the harbor shore floated remnants of the enemy's sea power.

The chief interest of the watching Marines centered on the enemy aircraft carriers. There were three of them, two aground and a third, though still afloat, listing heavily. Near the carriers were nests of destroyers with their superstructures blasted and wide holes in their hulls. Twelve submarines coated with rust lay deep in the water or beached against the ragged shore line.

The convoy dropped anchor about two miles from Sasebo. A flat peninsula close by extended into the bay and on it was a naval air station. From their transports the Marines of the 5th could see a small grass-covered runway, deserted hangars and heaps of aircraft wreckage around the field. It was here that the first occupation troops for southern Japan would go ashore.

Colonel Graham's CT 26 was the first unit to clamber down the cargo nets from the Grafton, Karnes, Bowie, Fallon and Alamance into the landing craft. The Marines debarked with their full battle equipment, ready for any emergency. The landing craft formed into waves at 0900 and made the short, choppy run ashore. There were no steep black beaches this time, but gently sloping seaplane ramps of concrete. Major Rea's LT 2/26 landed first and on their heels came Lieutenant Colonel Pollock's LT 1/26 and supporting units of the combat team and regimental headquarters. In less than two hours the combat team, less the 3d Battalion, the Weapons Company, and minor attachments, was ashore and advancing inland. It met no opposition of any kind.

The mission of the occupying forces was to see that the Japanese observed the terms of surrender. Accordingly surveillance over the area was immediately established. Units moved along the roads into Sasebo, placing guards on ammunition dumps and other stores of war materials and on gun emplacements and military buildings. When armed Japanese sentries were found they were disarmed and replaced by Marines.

Meanwhile General Robinson, the Assistant Division Commander, had debarked from landing craft at Sasebo itself with his staff and with Signal, Reconnaissance and Military Police detachments. This group moved rapidly through the center of the city to the Sasebo fortress artillery barracks and set up an ad-

Concurrently also, the transports carrying Colonel Wornham's 27th Marines moved into the Sasebo Navy Yard and debarked the 27th onto the docks. The regiment immediately deployed and moved out into the harbor area and the city proper. Shore-party battalions and LT 3/28 began to unload ships by 1500. Artillerymen under Colonel Waller landed at the Sasebo aircraft factory, a mile and a half away. The 1st Battalion of the 13th Marines had its howitzers emplaced and ready to fire by 1200. The 2d Battalion of the regiment acted as infantry troops and occupied the Japanese installations of the area. The 5th Tank Battalion landed at the naval air station and was also used as infantry. Other troops remained in reserve aboard ship prepared to debark instantly on order.

► OCCUPYING THE CITY

THUS THE MARINES of the 5th Division rapidly enveloped Sasebo, placing guards on every military installation and on such civilian centers as the post office, the police and fire stations, the water and gas works, the city hall, bus terminals, newspaper offices, the telephone and telegraph exchanges, and all sanitation and public health facilities. It rained at intervals as the work went on. The roads were poor and this slowed down the occupation to some extent, but nowhere did the 5th run into resistance. Japanese forces had been cleared from the area and so, apparently, had practically all civilians. Throughout the city itself were civilian police wearing swords but these had no clear notion of their duties and saluted when they were hailed and stood at respectful attention when they were questioned. They bowed deeply when the questioning was over.

The Leathernecks found satisfaction in what they saw. They had helped to whip the Japanese when the going was hardest. Now they saw that Sasebo was in the same condition as the fleet it once had harbored. It was a dead and unmanned city of two hundred thousand people. It seemed beyond all hope of recovery; its commerce and industry were at a standstill and extreme poverty was apparent. It was a scarred shadow of a once prosperous port, a symbol of war's destructiveness. Three months before this American B-29s had dropped thousands of fire bombs onto the city. In the words of an eyewitness, Sasebo became "a veritable hell . . . flames shooting two hundred feet into the air . . . screams of the dying and injured . . . rain pouring down in torrents . . . thousands of frightened Japanese running."

The raid caught the city by surprise and when the bombs had done their work great sheets of flame were driven across the city by the high winds, damaging or destroying three-quarters of the city area in the next twenty-four hours and killing more than a thousand and injuring two thousand more. Since then there had been no attempt to clear the wreckage except for a few of the principal streets. There was still an area two miles square covered with stinking rubble, the few frame buildings still rising from the ruins were scorched and blackened, and structures of corrugated iron were rusting and crumbling from rain and disuse. There was hardly an intact pane in any window. By government order all ceilings had been removed from houses, barracks and other buildings in order to keep incendiary bombs from starting fires in attics. A large Catholic church on one of the many hills sloping into the city remained intact.

The naval base had not been struck by bombs. It had, however been abandoned about a month before the 5th Marine Division occupied Sasebo and the Division found it a picture of decay and despair. With the steady shrinking of the Japanese fleet, the drydocks, ship cranes, and warehouses of Sasebo had deteriorated from lack of use and repair. Some shops had been stripped bare of their machinery, and the few still containing their equipment indicated that much of the machinery used had been of American and English make. Fuel drums and metal wreckage of all sorts lay along the concrete piers in an advanced state of rust. Long lines of military vehicles, flimsy in appearance, stood nearby. These had not been bombed; they were simply worn out.

But this surface appearance of weakness was belied by many facts to the contrary. As men of the 5th Division closely examined the city, they found numerous war plants and other military installations deep underground, untouched by bombs or fire. It became rapidly apparent that an invasion of Kyushu would have been costly indeed. The large army forces on the island had never been defeated. Kyushu was still a vast storehouse of military equipment. Its ample underground command and communication centers were intact as were the complete submarine assembly plants found in waterfront caves. Everything underground, including machine shops, repair shops, lens-grinding shops, was in an excellent state of preservation, and on close study of the installations above the surface it seemed probable that much of the deterioration from rust had occurred in the period of five weeks between the surrender and the occupation.

► THE JAPANESE CIVILIAN

THOSE PEOPLE OF SASEBO who had not fled peered from behind shuttered windows as the Marines advanced through their city. A few of the especially curious watched briefly from the doorways, but for the most part the native population hid fearfully from the occupying forces. Marines guarding installations and buildings even in the very heart of the city found that there was no one to guard them against. The streets remained deserted except for a few civilian police in their black uniforms and capes. Sasebo had been a rigidly guarded military area and few of its residents had seen white men before. All they knew of Americans was what lying propaganda had told them. And they knew, also, from that propaganda that the invading "barbarians" would in all probability kill them on the slightest provocation. The reason so many had fled the city was the expectancy of loot and rape, and their first sight of the grim and heavily armed Marines did nothing to alleviate their fear.

A Catholic church stands amid Sasebo's ruins.

But the city was not without signs of life. A baby cried behind one lattice-work with the yell of children all over the world. A few of the more venturesome came out hesitantly to sweep their shabby doorsteps. Late on the first day a few more came out into the streets and went nervously about their business. In the very center of the city a woman hoed a tiny vegetable patch between two burned-out buildings.

Soon there was a change. The children were the first to lose their fear. These doll-like small fry, most of them wearing uniforms and thoroughly accustomed to saluting, soon began to line the streets and gaze with wide eyes at the Marines and their vehicles. The children's curiosity was soon shared by their elders. Old and young alike seemed especially amazed at the American jeeps and trucks which, regardless of heavy rains and bad roads had the power to travel where their drivers took them. Bulldozers and other earth-moving equipment brought even more amazement. And not the least of the startling sight were the Marines themselves. Men with blue eyes and light hair were astonishing enough, but red-haired Marines were beyond imagination.

Direct indications of friendliness and hospitality were not long in following. One of the first units to enter Sasebo was the reinforced platoon of seventy Marines under Lieutenant Robert L. Davis. As his men moved rapidly through a cold rain into the heart of the city they were ready for trouble. But suddenly a Japanese woman ran toward them with a tray of cups and a steaming pot of tea, and then came a man with a basket of cakes. The men were hungry and cold but the order was—"no fraternization," and the platoon commander stuck to his orders. In the continuing rain his men then began to set up his command post in an open area that had been levelled by fire. In a little while several Japanese women came up with a sheet of canvas and began to erect a tent and Lieutenant David put it to use. A little later on another decision was necessary. Four girls from a nearby geisha house came to his headquarters in their best silk kimonos, squatted in a row in front of the tent and began to sing and create weird dances with dolls. This the Marines later described as "rather distracting," and so they ignored the geisha girls as best they could until they went back to their house. Still later one Leatherneck on guard at a busy intersection called frantically for the sergeant of the guard. The sentry was a tall, wavy-haired blond Marine of twenty. He was in special trouble for a Japanese woman had so admired his golden locks that she was following him back and forth along his post, tugging at his elbow and trying to stroke his hair, and he found it impossible to maintain a military bearing. Lieutenant Davis solved this one too. "The only thing I could do," he later explained, "was to call the Japanese civilian police to take her away. Then I put 'Blondie' on a less conspicuous corner."

By the close of the first day forty per cent of the 5th Marine Division was ashore. There had been no resistance whatever and the Japanese had everywhere cooperated exactly as directed. Unloading continued through that night and all the next day. The occupying Marines now had complete control of all military installations and equipment in the immediate Sasebo area.

On the afternoon of the second day General Bourke opened his Division command post ashore at the Sasebo Fortress. General Robinson's ADC group, which had first occupied the shabby, abandoned barracks, were forced to make one of the few retreats in Marine Corps history. Lice and other vermin had driven them out-of-doors. They went back into the barracks only after gallons of DDT had been sprayed by sanitation squads.

At dusk of the second day the whole of the 5th was ashore except for LT 3/26, CT 28 headquarters, and some of the service elements. They all landed the following day.

► GETTING SETTLED

IT WAS THE LIMITED DOCKING SPACE and the rundown port facilities which made the Sasebo unloading slow and difficult. Some ships unloaded in the stream into small boats. Ashore there was hardly any open storage space to be found, and most covered areas were crammed full of Japanese material. There was nothing to do but clear away parts of the burned-out sections with bulldozers to create space for storage dumps.

Hence the immediate demands on the engineer and Seabee units were heavy. They also had to go to work on supply roads at once for these soon proved inadequate, especially the roads that ran through rice-growing areas which were simply a mass of mud. Without sufficient equipment to quarry and crush rock for roads, they used what material they could find to widen and re-surface them and keep them in repair.

The Japanese military buildings used for billeting also needed extensive repairs. Native bathing and other sanitary facilities that were available did not come up to American standards, and the acrobatics required to use them were beyond the capabilities of most Marines. Nor could the filthy Japanese galleys be used. Moreover, the Japanese had not held men in the area to run the power systems which served the barracks. This and the fact that all local sources of water for washing and bathing had to be initially prohibited threw still further burdens on the engineers and Seabees. But soon they had units installed to purify the water for drinking and cooking.

In a few days General Bourke moved the Division command post from the artillery fortress in central Sasebo to the naval recruit training station at Ainoura, seven miles to the west, which CT 28 had originally occupied. Here there were wooden barracks and administration buildings for thirteen thousand troops, and in this area since 1941 the Japanese had trained recruits and held advance schooling in gunnery, torpedoes and signalling. More than one hundred forty thousand Japanese sailors had passed through the station by the end of the war. Marines of the 5th rapidly converted its huge parade ground into athletic fields and a landing strip for the planes of VMO-5.

The 5th Pioneer Battalion with military police and motor transport units then took over the Sasebo fortress. They furnished working parties to the Division quartermaster, unloading ships and providing guards for dumps and water points, and military police for the city.

Likewise busy were the Marine communication units. They set up a network of telephone wires to supplement radio contact between the different Division units and they tied in the Japanese wire circuits to other cities. They attracted so many native sidewalk supervisors that they were sometimes hardly able to complete their work. The wire-laying jeeps and Weasels and the wiremen's pole-climbing spikes had a special fascination. Almost the only vehicles the Japanese were accustomed to were antiquated trucks and cars converted into charcoal burners because of the gasoline shortage.

The military police posted "safeguard" signs on churches, shrines and schools. These signs exempted certain installations from search and trespass by occupation troops. They put "out-of-bounds" markers on the different "red light" districts. They handled the local traffic, adapting readily to the fact that it drove on the left-hand side of the road, and they kept a close watch for looting and straggling, and enforced a curfew from 1800 to 0600.

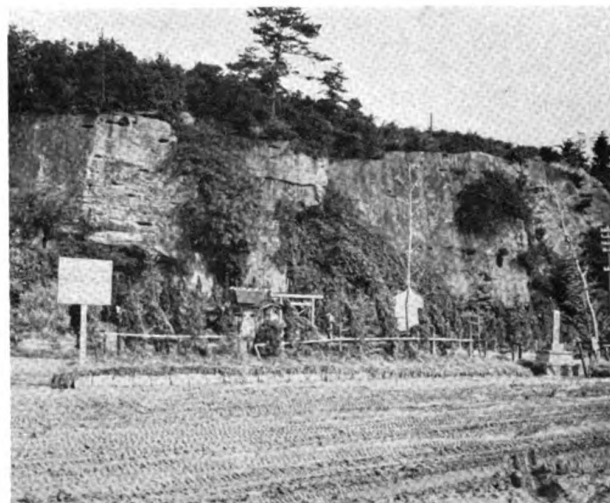

The Division quartermaster section wrestled with the big problem of furnishing the widely scattered and frequently moving military units with the items they needed. The Division Ordnance Company set up an ammunition dump and also began to sort the Japanese weapons classified as trophies. In their warehouse were 65,000 swords, 99,000 rifles, and thousands of other souvenirs—pistols, field glasses, spears and bayonets. The Division medical companies set up unit sick bays and staffed the Division hospital at Ainoura.

The 6th War Dog Platoon did night guard duty in the zone of CT 27. Many K-9s were already being demobilized. Many others could not be "agitated" for over three months and hence were of no use for guard or patrol.

The 31st Seabee Battalion repaired roads and performed other much-needed construction work. The artillerymen of the 13th Marines found the aircraft factory in the hills east of Sasebo completely vacated. The Japanese had even emptied hundreds of filing cabinets of records, and the actual work had been discontinued weeks before. Sagging and collapsed warehouses were still half-filled with crated parts of planes, the seaplane ramps and docks over which the 13th had landed were still piled high with materials, and there were thousands of airplane engines, boxes of 100-pound bombs, War trophies. Thousands of rifles, swords, and other weapons were turned over to the occupying forces as they stripped Japan of its armament.

As the 5th Marine Division completed its work of establishing order in the Sasebo area, preparations began for parts of the Division to extend the occupation throughout the northern areas of Kyushu and into nearby islands, including southern Honshu, the principal Japanese island.

Spread of Our Occupation

THE EXTENSION of the occupation beyond Sasebo actually began on the day after the first Marines of the 5th Division landed on the Japanese mainland. On the morning of the second day, the Omura occupation group—C Company, 27th Marines—began a thirty-mile trip by DUKW to seize the only airfield in that part of Japan capable of handling American fighters and transport planes. The big amphibian trucks, the DUKWs, rightfully famed for the fact that they could go almost anywhere, found the highway system of Kyushu considerably worse than the thick sands of Iwo Jima. The convoy wallowed for eight hours over narrow, muddy, and almost impassable roads before it reached Omura.

Marines of the 27th, under Lieutenant Colonel Robertson, occupied the town and the air station without a sign of opposition. All around the landing strip were bomb-blasted hangars, hundreds of wrecked and half-wrecked planes, and great stacks of other Japanese equipment. There was everything from furlined saddle bags from the Manchurian campaign to bomb-sights, aerial cameras, machine guns, artillery pieces, and mortars and even several hundred obsolete Russian rifles taken during the Russo-Japanese War of 1904-05.

At this area there developed some hesitancy on the part of Japanese naval forces to cooperate. They answered the questions asked of them but seemed indifferent as to whether or not their answers were correct. The army units, however, cooperated fully. Elements of the 2d Marine Division, which was based at Nagasaki, relieved our Omura occupation group on October 4, upon which C Company rejoined LT 1/27.

Three days after the occupation 5th Division patrols were sent to nearby rural areas and outlying villages. Only jeeps could negotiate some of the roads. From what they observed in these areas, the Marines felt thankful that the invasion of Japan never went beyond the planning stage. The same burrowing defenses which the Japs had used throughout the Pacific were evident in their homeland. Many extensive defenses were well along in construction. There were thousands of caves and gun emplacements along the principal roads and railroads, and storerooms, machine shops, and living quarters deep underground. Thick concrete made them bombproof, and clever camouflage hid them in the green hillsides. One huge ammunition dump had three steel doors, each like a vault entrance in a modern American bank.

The civilian population had apparently taken little notice of these preparations. In the scenic valleys and along the climbing terraces the Japanese farmer labored peacefully enough. Horses, oxen, and sometimes men and women turned the earth by pulling simple wooden plows, and in many places water buffalo stirred the flooded rice paddies. Misshapen dogs trotted lazily beside rickety farm carts, and children who had never known the horrors of bombing romped as youngsters do on any farm.

A few of the country women and children scrambled into their thatched-roof houses in plain fear of the Americans. But most of the Marine patrols were met with cheers, smiles, and bows instead of the sullen resentment which they had expected. For the most part, the people seemed happy to be rid of the Japanese Army, for it had confiscated everything of value they owned.

These rural Japanese were healthier and more prosperous than the people of the coastal cities. Their homes were in neat repair and the village streets were clear of filth, trash, and mud. The local officials and civilian police welcomed the Leathernecks and helped in collecting thousands of swords, pistols, and rifles.

One week after the landing, the 5th Marine Division's zone of responsibility was extended to include Yagahara, Miyazaki, Arita, Takeo, Saishi, Sechihara, and other small towns to the north and west of Sasebo, and these occupation missions proceeded satisfactorily. Everywhere, the Japanese guards over installations, stores, and equipment were relieved and Marine sentries placed on post offices, city halls, and other civic centers. And throughout the new zone the inventorying of war equipment began. Military government headquarters was established, and liaison with Japanese military and civilian leaders went according to plan. Whenever possible, the Japanese equipment was moved to central storage dumps in order to keep down the number of guard posts. In some places where the Marine detachments were too small to relieve all Japanese guards, surveillance was done by patrols and inspection parties instead.

Once occupying detachments were established, Marine patrols were ordered to surrounding areas to investigate Japanese compliance with the surrender terms and to collect weapons from military guards and civilian police. These patrols—which varied in size from a reinforced platoon to a few men—sometimes remained in small towns for several days until they had completed their missions, and then went back to them at irregular intervals to check on the people. Foot patrols several times checked remote areas.

In each town or village occupation orders were issued to the civil police, mayors, and ken (county) officials, who were held responsible for their execution. One patrol uncovered a cache of twenty-three tons of Chinese coins brought over from Shanghai in 1944 more for their scrap metal value than their currency value.

Jeeps were the most satisfactory vehicles for patrolling. Larger patrols sometimes used DUKWs but they were difficult to navigate over the narrow, twisting roads. However, the Japanese in this area, too, were indiscriminate in their admiration of all American vehicles, from jeeps to earth-moving equipment. Heavy rains at this time of year made roads impassable to Japanese rolling stock, but American transportation churned through the mud without much trouble while the Japanese looked on in open-mouthed wonder.

nese shores. Nearby were assembly and machine shops, abandoned and dilapidated.

Seven miles west of Sasebo near the fishing village of Ainoura, a patrol boarded the battleship Shikishima. Immobilized since 1920 and stripped of her guns, this barnacle-ridden man-of-war had been the flagship of Admiral Kaminura, Admiral Togo's deputy during the great naval battle which had destroyed the Russian fleet forty years before. The 15,000-ton battleship—the size of a modern cruiser—had become a national monument. Near Shikishima was a modern Japanese destroyer badly damaged by carrier planes off the Philippines. Together these ships symbolized the beginning and end of Japanese sea power.

On October 2 the Reconnaissance Company pushed north from Sasebo in DUKWs, put to sea for a few thousand yards, and then moved west onto sixty-square-mile Hirado Island. This island, never bombed, still had felt the pinch of war through extreme poverty. Shopkeepers and plain citizens, many of whom were seeing white men for the first time, apprehensively retreated into their homes and barred their doors.

After Marines set up their command post and living quarters in an elementary school, education began to suffer. Teachers—always deferred to before the occupation—found themselves of secondary interest to the strange-looking men who had come to Hirado. Marine attention, on the other hand, centered more on rifles they found in the school, where military drill and bayonet fencing had been part of the curriculum. After the Marines had been on the island a short time they started patronizing the barber shop, always in pairs. One Marine sat in the chair while another stood armed guard to make certain that the barber did not suffer an attack of patriotism while he had a razor in his hand. There were ticklish moments when they found that a Japanese shave included running the sharp blade lightly over the nose and high on the cheeks under the eyes, but there was apparently enough universality in barbering to allay suspicions.

The Reconnaissance Company stayed on the island for three days collecting weapons and inspecting shipyards and fish canneries, went back to the mainland, and returned to Hirado for six days in mid-November to dispose of weapons.

Before large bodies of troops spread over northern Kyushu to expand the occupation, advance parties moved into the new areas and arranged with military and ken officials for housing troops and for collecting arms and war material. Sanitary squads went along to delouse billets. Everywhere the Japanese cooperated fully and prepared the civil population for the arrival of the main force.

► FUKUOKA

ONE WEEK AFTER the landing, General Robinson took command of the Fukuoka occupation force, consisting of the 28th Marines, the 5th Assault Signal

Company, and medical, engineer, motor transport, and headquarters units. This force, under Corps control, moved to the port of Fukuoka, seventy-five miles north of Sasebo, by truck and railroad.

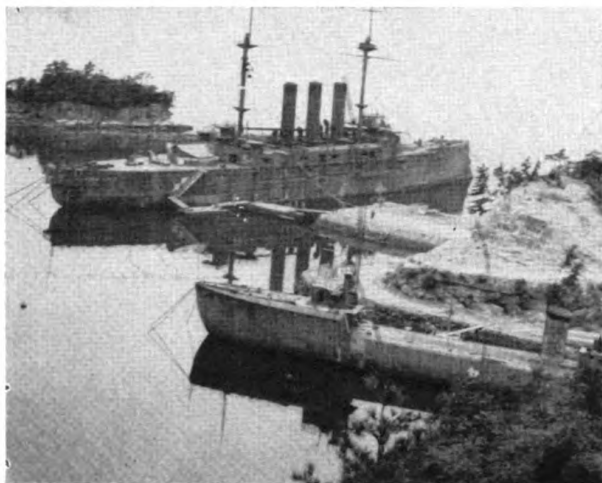

The three hundred thousand residents of northern Kyushu's biggest city scarcely paused in their daily routine as the occupation force moved in. After General Robinson conferred with ranking Japanese officers, he ordered sentries posted on the more important buildings and dock facilities, and, in a swift move to crush a suspected black market in foreign exchange immediately closed all branches of the Bank of Chosen, posted guards, sealed safes and vaults, and impounded records.

B-29s had raided Fukuoka, blasting thirty square blocks of its business and waterfront area. Through the center of the rubble a wide, paved street stretched for two miles from the railroad station to the docks. It was choked with long, straggling lines of Oriental people going home. Thousands of Japanese soldiers who had arrived from Korea were streaming inland to board trains. Unarmed but in uniform, they struggled under the weight of bulging packs and recently deloused bundles of bedding. These stone-faced, beaten troops had been mustered out of the army when they left Korea for the dangerous voyage through mined waters to Fukuoka, and each one of the fifty-two thousand who debarked in October paid his own railroad fare home.

On the other side of the street, Koreans shuffled hopefully toward the ships which would take them home. More than two million of these oppressed people were in Japan at the close of the war. Many had been slave laborers in coal mines and most of them wanted to go back to Korea. As they straggled along the street some dragged rickety carts heaped with children and a few possessions, others were in rags, many were barefoot, and the rest had only paper-thin sandals. The more fortunate ones had reached Fukuoka from the interior by train, but the rest had trudged for days over rough, dusty roads to reach the coast. Near the docks as many as five thousand huddled in filth and squalor, covered with flies, and fighting off huge harbor rats that more than rivalled them in number.

The U.S. Navy moved quickly to safeguard the lives of Japanese and Korean repatriates, sending the minesweeper Prestige in to clear Fukuoka harbor. Nineteen Japanese ships already had struck magnetic mines sown by B-29s during raids on the port, and sixteen of those, totalling forty-eight thousand tons, were either sunk in the harbor or beached with heavy loss of life. The Prestige, first American ship to enter Fukuoka since 1941, and several Japanese minesweepers, began clearing the deadly mines from the harbor.

Patrols from the 28th Marines occupied airfields and military installations in the Fukuoka area. At one aircraft factory they found a new-type fighter plane—a six-bladed pusher capable of 420-mph speeds.

Marines discovered that seventy-five per cent of all Japanese military aircraft had been so badly damaged by a late-September typhoon that they could not get off the ground. In accordance with surrender terms, the planes had been parked and abandoned on nearby fields for delivery to the occupation forces. (The Japanese, when they surrendered, still had at least 7,500 planes capable of making a one-way suicide flight against an invasion armada.) The typhoon, striking less than a week before the American forces landed, had smashed hundreds to bits and had stacked others in piles six deep.

Patrols also found that many American flyers killed during raids over Japan and buried in scattered graves, could never be identified. The Japanese had destroyed all burial records. This came to light when Marines tried to identify three graves near Yawata—the Pittsburgh of Japan—north of Fukuoka. Simple markers said only: "Grave of flyers of United States plane," and gave the date of crash. At some of these grave sites there was not even any indication of how many men had been buried in the common grave.

Squads from the 28th Marines posted guard over eleven camps which held about 3,200 Chinese coal-mine workers in the Fukuoka area. About half were civilians who had contracted voluntarily to work for the Japanese, but the others were prisoners of war from Communist forces in North China and from the armies of Chiang Kai-shek, and civilians brought to Japan by force.

The Chinese, who had been idle for nearly two months after the surrender, began looting Japanese supplies and running wild, terrorizing the countryside. They claimed that coal-mine operators had not paid them their five yen (thirty-three cents) a day and that one-third of their group had died from exposure, starvation, and lack of medical attention. The Marines interceded only after the Japanese police admitted they were powerless to control the rioting Chinese.

While the Fukuoka occupation force kept order and supervised the arrival of Japanese troops from overseas, raiding parties were sent out to check prisons to determine whether or not they had obeyed General MacArthur's decree ordering the liberation of political prisoners. Intelligence patrols scoured villages for weapons and subversive activity.

Extension of this northern zone began on October 4 when K Company, LT 3/28, under Major Peatross crossed the narrow strait onto southern Honshu and occupied Shimonoseki. Shimonoseki Strait—a tight passage into Japan's scenic inland sea—had been heavily mined by B-29s during the war, and now many half-sunken ships choked the sea around Moji and prevented movement of shipping.

Two days later another reinforced company moved to Moji at Kyushu's northern tip, and the rest of Major Smoak's 3d Battalion soon followed, forming the Shimonoseki-Moji occupation group. Unable to find suitable billets in the smashed city, Marines moved aboard a tied-up Japanese passenger liner.

Major Henry R. Rolph and a fifty-man detachment moved from Shimonoseki farther north to Yamaguchi on October 11, and a week later forty-two Marines occupied the port of Senzaki. Here they inspected Japanese arriving from overseas for excess currency and food, and supervised medical examination. This detachment also processed thousands of Chinese and Koreans for repatriation.

Patrols and small military police detachments operating from Fukuoka policed Kokura and Yawata, both heavily damaged. In Yawata, oddly enough, Japan's largest steel mills were only lightly damaged but the business and residential sections of the Pittsburgh of Japan were shattered.

Only once did Japanese in the northern occupation zone fail to comply with the surrender terms. A major general and three majors on the staff of the Western District Army had retained their pistols. The commanding general of this Japanese army was ordered to arrest these officers. They were jailed for thirty days and lost half their pay for that period.

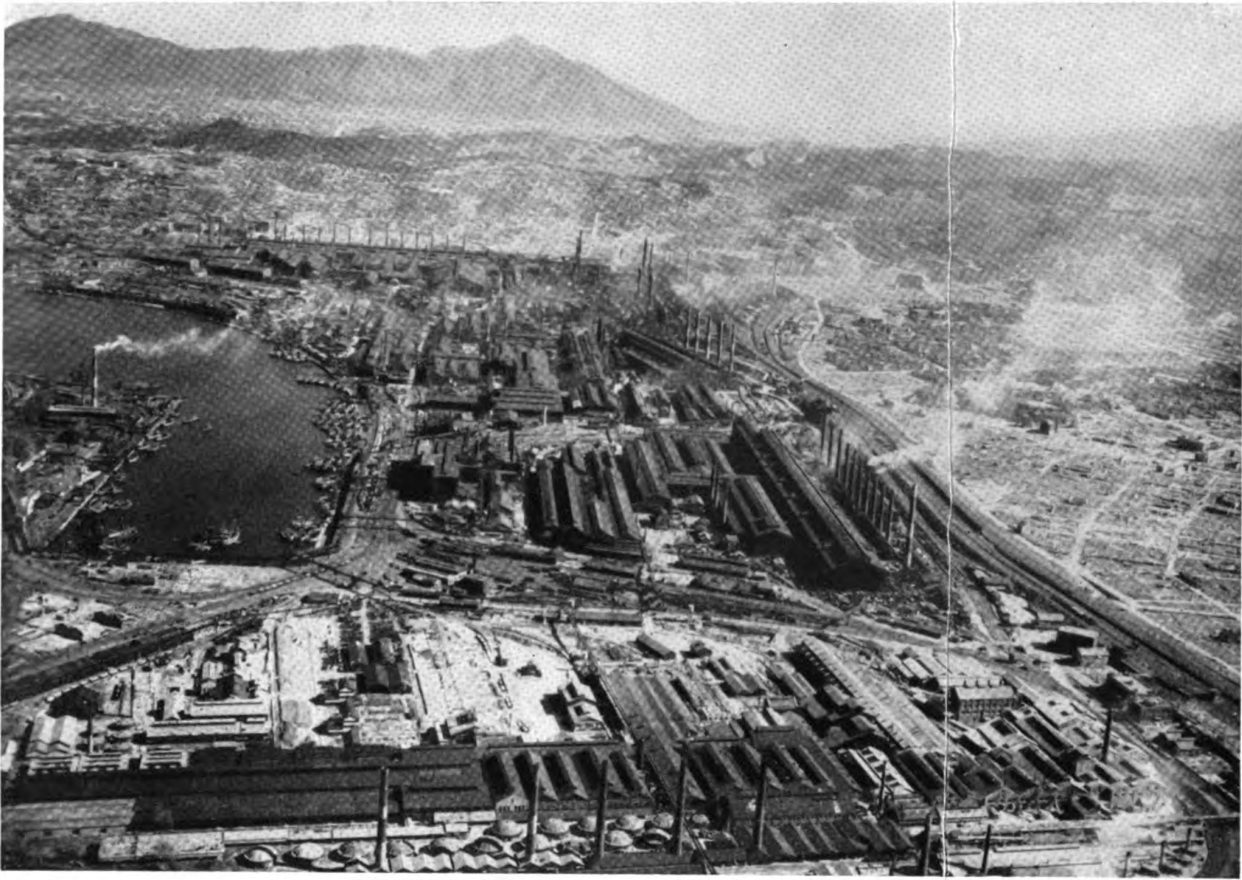

The Army's 32d Infantry Division, which arrived at Fukuoka in mid-October, gradually took over occupation missions from General Robinson's Marines. CT 28 returned to Sasebo, and General Robinson's headquarters was renamed the Fukuoka Base Command with orders to concentrate on opening the harbor for United States shipping.

► ISLAND HOPPING

ALTHOUGH PATROLS USING LCVPs covered the small outlying islands around Sasebo, the heavily mined waters of western Kyushu delayed occupation of the larger islands in the Division zone. On November 3, however, a reinforced company from LT 1/27 under Major Russell set out to patrol the ninety-six islands of Goto Retto.

Most of the 250,000 natives were farmers or fishermen, and over half were Roman Catholics whose ancestors had sought haven from persecution by early Japanese rulers. The militaristic spirit among these people was less pronounced than among those on Kyushu, they were better fed and healthier, and their homes were larger and cleaner. Too, they seemed pleased at the arrival of the occupation force, and many of them said openly that they were disgusted with the militaristic policy of the government of Japan and hoped the Americans would stay to help recon-vert their country.

Marines found that these Japanese hated Tojo. His propaganda and deception during his last year as Premier were so gross that even the lie-fed Japanese could no longer be deceived. The people of Goto Retto felt that Japan was experiencing "great shame" because of the Japanese soldiers' treatment of prisoners. They felt this more, they said, after "observing the gentlemanly actions of the occupation troops."

A patrol from Major Russell's reinforced company destroyed big guns on three islands of the Goto Retto, demolished or dumped into the sea automatic weapons and all ammunition for them, and returned to Sasebo with about 6,000 rifles, 7,000 bayonets, 550 swords, and 138 pistols.

► MOVEMENT EAST

WHEN the Division zone was expanded again on October 5 to take in north central Kyushu, newly promoted Lieutenant Colonel Antonelli moved his

LT 2/27 to Saga about forty miles east of Sasebo. At an airfield there the battalion found 178 fighter planes, all but eight smashed by typhoons. Antonelli's men also discovered a huge ammunition dump where the Japanese had stored about one-fifth of the country's ammunition for home defense.

A patrol from the Saga group located an internment camp at Shimizu where Dutch, British, Italians, Portuguese, Swiss, and Belgians had been confined during the war. The only remaining internee was an 82-year-old Swiss who amazed everyone by proving that he was an ex-U.S. Marine. Edward Zillig had enlisted in the Marine Corps in 1888 in Philadelphia, had been discharged in 1893, and then had re-enlisted during the Spanish-American War. He produced a letter from the Veterans Administration showing that he had received a pension. From 1936 until his house was blown to bits he had lived in Nagasaki with his Japanese wife. Zillig turned over two items to the patrol: (1) a statement of the kind treatment he had received from a Japanese police sergeant, and (2) a request for renewal of his $60-a-month pension.

Back in the Sasebo area the 1st Battalion, 27th Marines, assumed control of the entire regimental zone when Colonel Wornham moved his headquarters and the 3d Battalion to Kurume on October 21. In spite of an August air raid that had smashed the business district, Kurume—rubber industry center of 77,000 people—boasted a Chamber of Commerce as aggressive as any in the United States. It held classes in English for its members, and, when the provost marshal closed the city's geisha houses, the CofC staged an all-geisha show for Marines in the latter's own theater.

The 27th Marine headquarters at Kurume assumed control of its 2d Battalion at Saga, twenty miles to the west, and directed patrolling in its new zone during the next month, searching out Japanese installations and war material. Supplies civilians could use were turned over to the Japanese Home Ministry and strictly military supplies were destroyed. In late November Colonel Wornham, who had led the regiment since its organization, was ordered to the United States and Colonel Williams, executive officer of the Fukuoka Base Command and CT 28's exec on Iwo Jima, took charge.

► TSUSHIMA

MAJOR RUSSELL and his 1st Battalion, 27th Marines, left Sasebo in late November to occupy Kamino Shima and Shimono Shima, two large, heavily fortified islands halfway between Kora and Japan. Together they formed the Tsushima group.

A Japanese general who had commanded eight thousand garrison troops there during the war formally surrendered the area aboard an LST. Within two hours Marines had a command post set up ashore, and the Japanese were hauling ammunition and weapons aboard ship for dumping at sea. The speed with which the islands were disarmed amazed the natives who turned out by the hundreds to get a glimpse of the Americans.

On Shimono Shima two 12-inch guns, supposedly destroyed by the Japanese after the Washington Disarmament Conference of 1922, were finally blasted out of action. The Japanese battleship whose guns these were had been scrapped more than twenty years before in accordance with the 5-5-3 agreement among the United States, Great Britain, and Japan, but the guns had been carefully removed first.

On Kamino Shima Marines found an even bigger prize. Here two 16-inch cannon pointed toward Korea, where an identical set was emplaced to fire back toward Kamino Shima. Between them the batteries could cover the entire width of the 60-mile strait between Kamino Shima and Korea. For seven days Marines supervised the disposal of the huge 1,000-pound shells for these guns. Troops lived aboard ship during their two-week stay at Tsushima.

Patrols operating ashore discovered the grave of an American flyer. It was decorated with bamboo vases and persimmon branches and had been well cared for by the Japanese. There was one Christian church on Shimono Shima but it was closed. The minister, natives explained, "was absent."

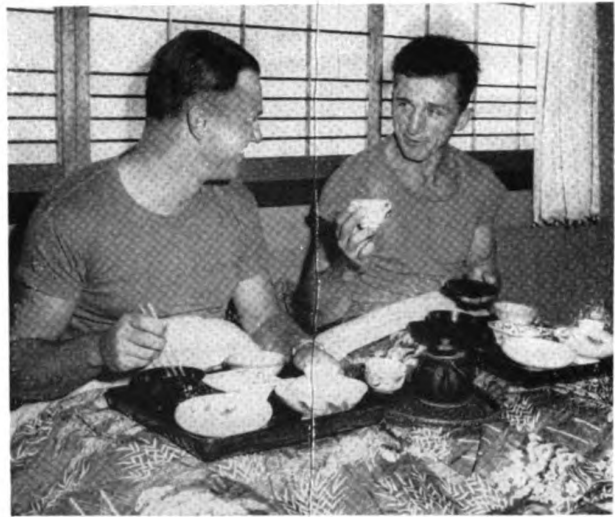

► OITA-BEPPU

TANKS WERE NEVER USED even for show purposes because the soft roads would not bear their weight. The Iwo-scarred Shermans had been landed and parked at the Sasebo naval air station, and there they remained. Leathernecks of the 5th Tank Battalion did guard duty and formed disposition and unloading details. In mid-October Company A, reinforced, under Lieutenant Colonel Collins, boarded a train for occupation duty at Oita on the eastern side of the island.

These Marines had a memorable 180-mile trip as two sputtering engines pulled the rattling train through the story-book scenery of northern Kyushu. The cars, much like obsolete day coaches on American railroads even when they were new, and now in sad shape, were still considered among Japan's finest. Conductors were totally unfamiliar with English, and so stayed in continual befuddlement through the trip as Marines kept stopping them to ask such questions as "When do we change for Pittsburgh?" and "Where's the club car?"

The fertile valleys and sharp peaks of Japan's miniature mountains frequently disappeared as the train passed through tunnels while smoke and cinders poured through broken windows and gagged the passengers. When the Nipponese "Super Chief" stopped at small villages, children and grownups alike flocked around the coaches to see the "men of victory."

At Oita, Marines found the naval air station smashed by bombs although about a hundred planes were semi-operational. The city itself was forty per cent razed. (Oita had never been singled out for U.S. Air Force raids but it was used as a last resort target whenever B-29s were diverted or had part of a payload left to drop.)

The occupation of eastern Kyushu soon spread north to Beppu where Japan's famous beaches and shore resorts were located. When they questioned an Italian-born priest in Beppu, Marines learned the Japanese press version of the battle of Iwo Jima. The Japanese, it seemed, were "progressing daily" toward the northern part of the island, had lost only three thousand men to America's twenty thousand and had finally allowed the invaders to capture the island in order to trap them.

"We didn't know until a long time after the battle had ended that Iwo Jima was lost," he said.

Later a Marine scouting party set out from Oita to find the common grave of four B-29 crewmen which was reported in the area. When they found it they discovered a group of Japanese holding a memorial service for the flyers, whose plane had crashed a year ago to the day. While a Buddhist priest conducted the service, a Japanese Christian minister prayed for the souls of the American airmen.

By late October the Division was deployed across the entire island of Kyushu with major elements at Sasebo, Fukuoka, Saga, Kurume, and Oita. Most supply was by Japanese railroads, because the highways had literally disintegrated from heavy rains and lack of repair and were passable only for jeeps. During this time VMO-5's light planes were used for reconnaissance, air courier service, personnel and freight transportation, and aerial photography.

Japan under the Occupation

THE OCCUPATION TROOPS soon realized that, although Japan had been a world power, her standards of living and efficiency were far below those of the Western world. Men who occupied the once-great naval base at Sasebo saw that the city's business, manufacturing, and residential centers were about on a level with those common in America a half century before. They were not prepared for the poverty of the people, their ignorance of world affairs, their backward, almost medieval way of life. Little they saw matched their preconceived idea of Japan as a modern nation, the leader of the Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere.

Construction equipment, tools, and transportation were sadly lacking. Men and women alike labored days to accomplish what one American bulldozer could do in minutes. Japanese labor gangs with straw baskets and simple hand implements would have taken ten years to clear the rubble from their burned-out cities.

Unclean living conditions, poor diet, and lack of clothing and household goods were partly but not entirely due to the war. The eighty million people jammed into an area the size of California had never known much better. Those who rebelled had been whipped into line by fear of the military, the civil police, and the dreaded secret societies.

Marines discovered something else about the Japanese. They learned why they had fought with the tenacity and fury that had cost the lives of so many Americans in battles across the Pacific. Unbelievable discipline, stoicism, and blind courage, the roots of which reached back to early childhood, enabled them to fight bravely against impossible odds, to die in a lost cause.

Before Marine occupation forces landed on Kyushu an Army recovery team had made a nine-day sweep through the twenty-two prisoner-of-war camps on the island. The team liberated over nine thousand Allied soldiers and civilians, about fifteen hundred of whom were Americans. Dutch, British, and Australians made up the majority of the rest, although a few Canadians, Norwegians, South Africans, Indians and Czechs also were freed.

Prisoners had reported atrocities almost everywhere. Japanese at a camp at Inatsukumat forced an American soldier to work in a coal mine although he was rapidly going blind from vitamin deficiency. Other prisoners saved every carrot in their scanty rations for the ill man. An Australian who had been appointed head of prisoners at another mine, was blamed when a coal train broke loose and smashed up. The Japanese strapped him in a kneeling position with a bamboo rod under his legs to cut off circulation, left him outside in freezing weather for thirty-six hours, and then threw him into a cell for a week with only bread and water to eat, and without medical attention. Both his legs had to be amputated.

At another camp, prisoners amputated the arm of a man who had been injured in a mine accident. The amputation was performed with razor blades and a hacksaw after the Japanese refused medical instruments or opiates, although they had large supplies of both.

After Japan's surrender, B-29s dropped supplies to these prisoners with such good aim that the POWs themselves were endangered. With every man gaining a pound a day, plenty of supplies on hand, and their quarters smashed when supply chutes failed to open, inmates of a camp at Ita used flour to spell out a message to relief planes. It read, "No More!"

The Division's seventeen language officers and twenty-two enlisted linguists had been parceled out among the units, where they checked Japanese inventories, made contact with civil officials and military commanders, accompanied patrols, aided in the disposition of military equipment, translated documents, and did a great deal of interrogating.

They questioned many prominent citizens, most of whom contended that the peoples' minds had been warped and stifled by war lords who had fed them a diet of steady lies. Nearly all felt that the occupation would improve social, business, and economic conditions in their country. This, of course, is hardly a startling revelation since almost any change would have been for the better.

A few Japanese hoped that Emperor Hirohito would be removed or limited in his powers, but most believed he should not be deposed, and still held a strong loyalty to the Throne.

Most ordinary citizens did not know for three days after the surrender that Japan had been defeated. One Japanese told a language officer: "It was a great shock to us. We had no idea that our country's losses were so great and had no conception that Japan would ever surrender. It is impossible to describe the near-panic that most of the people here felt. They were certain that they would be killed."

Among the political reforms planned for Japan was the introduction of female suffrage. A public opinion survey showed that 52 per cent of those interviewed favored giving women the vote, 34 per cent did not express an opinion and the rest had no idea what female suffrage was.

Japan was evidently not ripe for public opinion polls. The poorly educated, ill-informed man in the street had been denied the privilege of free thought, expression, and knowledge of national and world affairs for so many years that he could not be persuaded to express an opinion on anything, assuming, of course, that he had one.

After the initial shock of the "invasion" these people were satisfied for the most part to return as quickly as possible to the routine of daily living without giving much thought to their newly won rights and civil liberties. Military occupation, though much in evidence, interfered as little as possible with the normal civilian pursuits of eating, sleeping, earning a living, and bringing up children.

Before 0800 each morning the children of Japan assembled in their various neighborhoods and marched to school. Student sentries saluted the leaders smartly as the uniformed boys and girls entered the schoolyards. Inside the students sat at attention during classes.

According to the principal of one school, all this had nothing to do with militarism. Military training had stopped, he said, a few days after the war had ended and instructors in military education had been dismissed. Saluting, he pointed out, was an ordinary form of greeting—the simplest and most convenient thing to do. The children marched to improve Japanese posture and style of walking "which suffered in comparison to Occidentals." Group formations, he said, were to foster "cooperative spirit." The Japanese educator conceded, however, that Nippon's army had encouraged all this.

It was obvious that schools had introduced strong military, anti-democratic, and anti-American propaganda. In one institution a bamboo spear corps whose mission was to oppose U.S. landings had been organized and was attached to the local garrison force of old men and young boys. Marines soon put a stop to all this. Schools were ordered to discontinue Kendo and Judo and soon were stressing cooperation with occupation forces. By November military government detachments assigned to units of the 5th had eliminated the last vestige of military training from school curricula. In addition, nationalistic doctrines championing a greater, more powerful Japan were fast being deleted from courses. Lack of new textbooks greatly handicapped democratic education, but teachers in many cities made up for the lack by lecturing on the principles of democracy.

► LIBERTY

TO COMBAT INFLATION, Marines coming into Japan did not carry a single piece of U.S. money. Paymasters collected all U.S. money from the men and repaid it later in Japanese Government yen at fifteen yen to the dollar.

A week after the initial occupation, Lieutenant Colonel Hugh Shippey, the Division paymaster, made the largest single financial transaction ever handled by the Sinwa Bank of Sasebo. As wide-eyed bank employees looked on, his Marine guards drew more than seven and a half million yen—about $450,000 in American money—for the first payday ashore.

Liberty call sounded on October 1 and Marines began to get a more leisurely look at Japan. Special MP units patrolled Sasebo, Haiki, and Ainoura, where troops were most heavily concentrated. Only twenty-five per cent of each unit was granted liberty at one time, and passes expired at 1800 because of the curfew.

Leathernecks "went ashore" with a set of commandments ringing in their ears. Private dwellings, churches, shrines, and schools were out of bounds. Anything more than casual fraternization with civilians was forbidden. All Japanese religious and domestic customs were to be respected, and the Emperor was not to be mentioned in conversation. Marines could trade neither clothing nor equipment for goods or souvenirs, nor eat Japanese-prepared food. Each man was ordered to shave daily, wear clean clothes, and remain in the uniform of the day.

deserted ten days before, teeming with Japanese who seemed always to be on the move. An endless line of scurrying pedestrians and bicyclists, most of whom carried heavy bundles, turned the small shopping area that remained unburned into a human ant hill. Who were these people? Workers? Most of the factories were closed or destroyed. Shoppers? Very few stores were open and these had almost nothing to sell. Marines decided that the Japanese had come out to look over their conquerors.

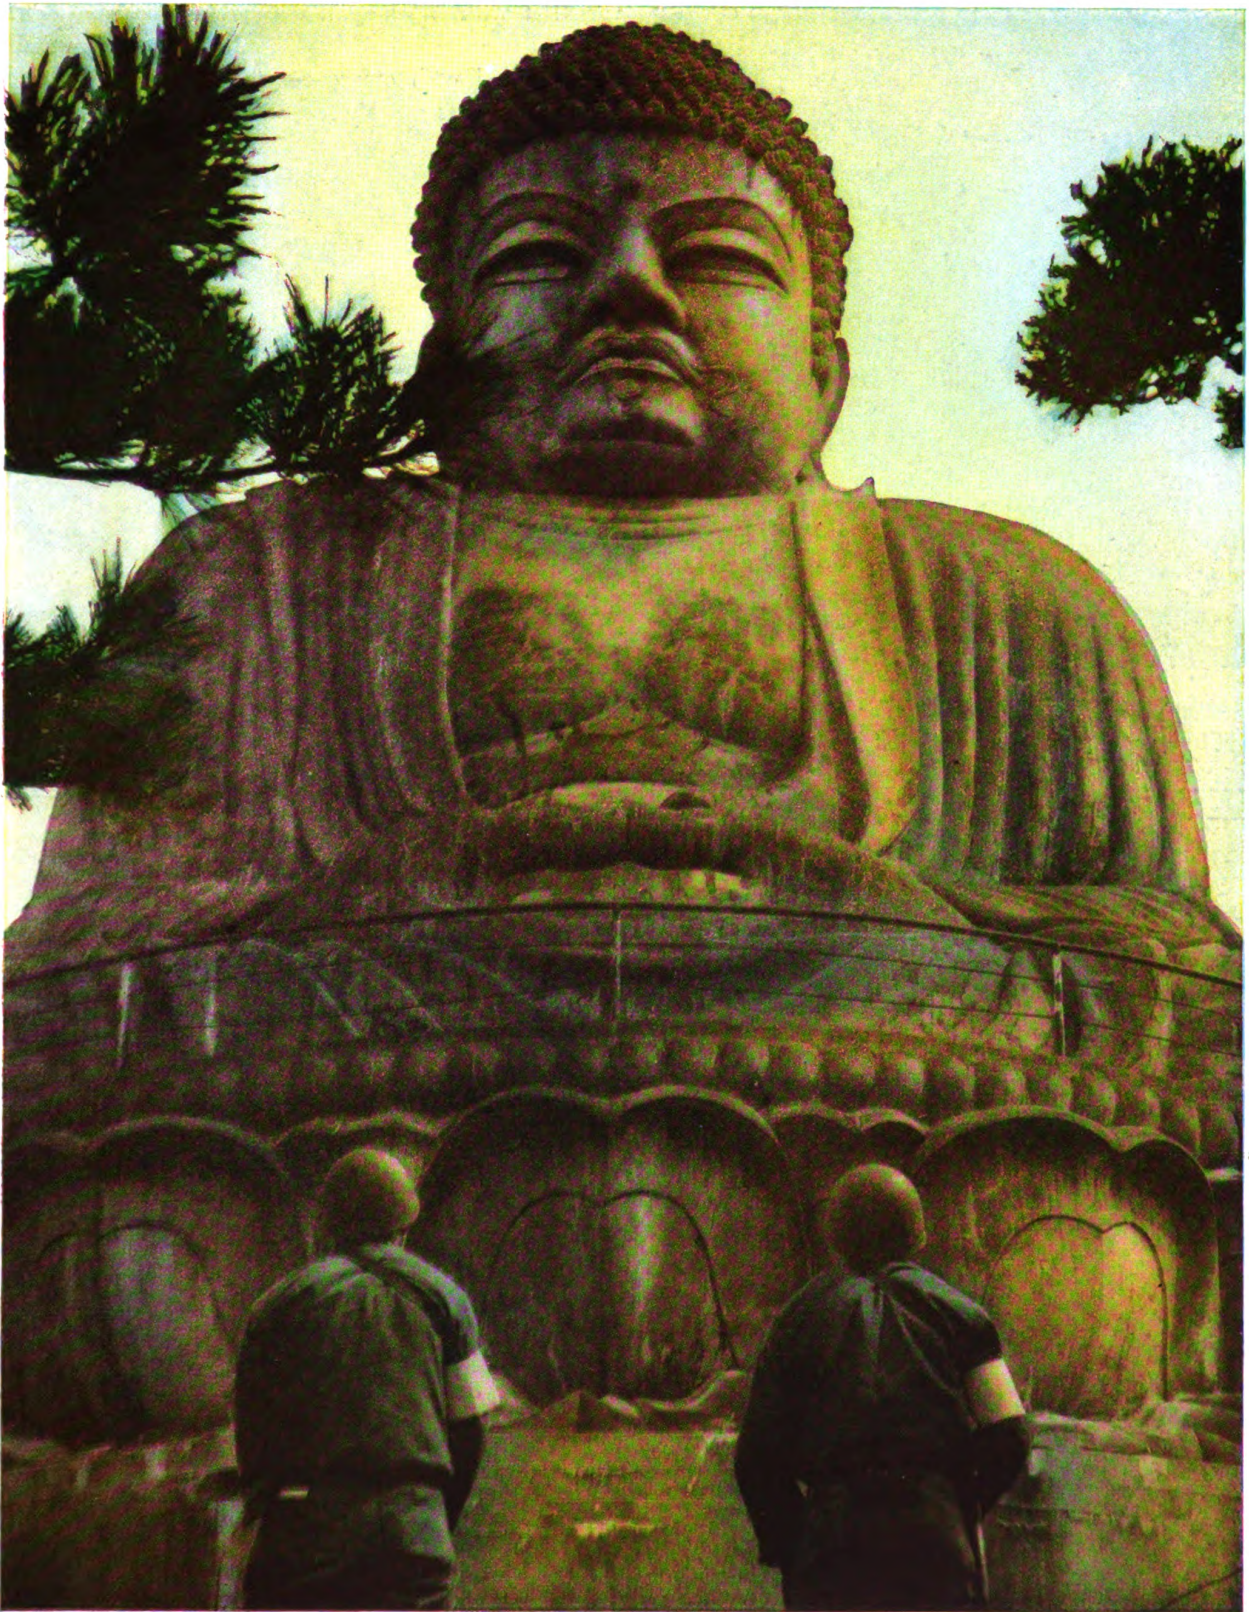

Division troops had a field day exchanging salutes with their late enemies. Stocky little Japanese soldiers, sailors, and civilian police stood at attention and saluted each passing Marine from buck private on up, apparently taking no chances with rank. One wandering four-year-old, naked as a jay-bird, emulated his elders by throwing snappy salutes at each passing Marine. A few coolies appeared with rickshas and soon were doing a brisk business, but the inevitable happened—Leathernecks exchanged places with them and raced pell mell through the crowded streets.

The few shops that were open had little to sell, but made the best of what they had. One enterprising Japanese merchant did a lively business selling wooden back scratchers. Others peddled paper flags, well worn kimonos and Japanese dolls.

The closest thing to entertainment in Japan was the geisha house, and the popular notion that these were houses of ill repute turned out to be untrue. Visiting Marines, leaving their shoes at the door, sat cross-legged on the mat floor and watched as heavily powdered girls dressed in colorful silk kimonos enacted dramatically significant native dances as they weaved in circles, looked coyly down their sleeves and poured imaginary streams of water over their wrists and arms. When they sang they were accompanied by other geishas who strummed three-stringed, lute-like instruments. To Marine ears the shrill, sing-song lyrics sounded vaguely like "Peachie, peachie, choppa, choppa, dong, dong, dong."

The only state in the U.S. the Japanese knew about was Ohio—so the occupation troops thought. It turned out, however, that what the natives were saying was "o-ha-yo," which means "good morning" in Japanese. It soon became a national byword between Marines and natives, and most Leathernecks used it any time of the day, although a few "students" of the language varied it with "koan-bahn wa" which means "good day."

Equipped with orange-colored GI phrase books many Americans quickly learned enough Japanese to buy souvenirs and stamps and to carry on simple conversations. The average Marine, however, summed up his thoughts on the language barrier somewhat like a Georgian who said: "I was going to surprise the folks back in Georgia by learning to speak Jap real well while I was here. But this stuff snows me. So I guess the folks'll have to settle for me talking just plain Georgian some more."

The Japanese, in turn, picked up some English. "Hubba, hubba" in Marine Corps lingo meant "hurry up." Children followed Leathernecks along the streets shouting "hubba, hubba, Ma-warine." Although the native word for candy was "ka-shee" tiny street urchins soon learned that "can-dee" brought better results, and screamed it endlessly as they stretched out their hands. The Japanese word for cigarette—"to-ba-ko"—soon was changed to the more understood "sigaretto."

The Division's hurried move from Hawaii had resulted in most personal baggage being left with the Division rear echelon, and this, combined with life in drafty unheated barracks and the cool, damp weather of Japan, made living quite uncomfortable.

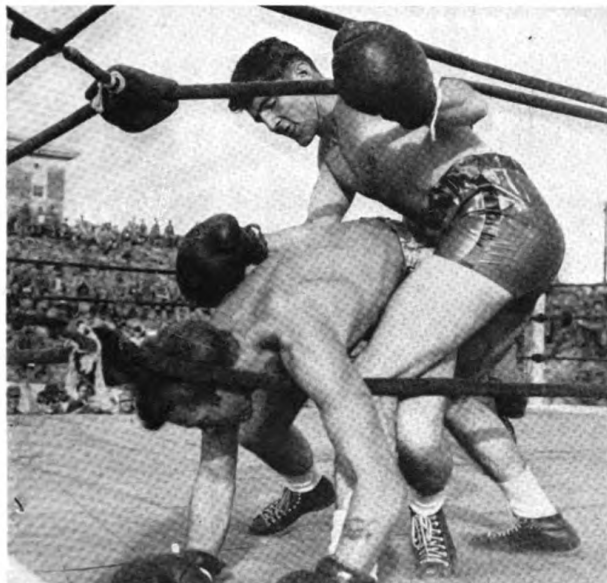

The occupation troops' health, however, was excellent. "Cat fever" was common but heavy wool and wet-weather clothing, shots, and rigidly enforced disease control reduced sickness. DDT eliminated vermin, troops practiced strict water discipline, and Japanese were not allowed to handle or prepare food for Marines.

Food issued to the Division was unbalanced and lacked variety at best, and frequent moves and patrols required extensive use of combat rations. C rations, heated in tubs of boiling water, were the standard menu until the galleys went into operation, and then it turned out that the garrison rations were two-thirds corned-beef hash. Providentially a load of turkeys arrived at Sasebo on November 1, the Division's private Thanksgiving Day in gratitude for the fact that Spearhead Marines were not at that moment assaulting Kyushu, as had been originally planned.

Planes landing at Sasebo Bay and Omura brought occasional mail from home, although several tons of letters and packages bound for the 5th Division had been destroyed in the October 10 typhoon that flattened Okinawa. This same typhoon hit Kyushu on October 11 and heavily damaged barracks, communications, and power facilities. Marines who tried to buck the 90-mile-an-hour winds were blown off their feet.

Special Service officers launched a series of programs to occupy off-duty time and to raise morale. Athletics played an important part in these programs, and units squared off in football, basketball, baseball, and volleyball tournaments. Marines occasionally played local Japanese teams, especially in baseball, which the Japanese played extremely well.

Warehouses became recreation halls equipped with radios and phonographs and featured beer gardens, reading rooms, post exchanges, and libraries. Moving pictures were shown nightly in each area.

Stateside newspapers and magazines circulated through the units, and the Public Information Section and Signal Company teamed up to publish a daily edition of The Spearhead. Boxing smokers, band concerts, Japanese entertainers, and several USO shows all took up Marines' leisure hours. Groups of Leathernecks fished or went sailing while others worked out in made-over gymnasiums where Japanese experts gave demonstrations of Judo and Kendo. At Fukuoka a Japanese professor at the Kyushu Imperial University opened a language school for troops in the northern area.

In November the 5th Division began a training program designed to help Marines prepare for their return to civilian life. Instructors explained veterans' benefits, the GI Bill of Rights, and the advantages of Government Life Insurance. Lieutenant Colonel DeSantis, the 5th's Special Service officer, set up a Division school—which drew nearly a thousand students—in a Japanese naval museum at Ainoura. Units scattered across Kyushu launched separate educational programs.

Voluntary instructors taught academic and vocational courses, covered contemporary political and economic problems, and surveyed civilian job opportunities. Enrollment for correspondence courses in the Marine Corps and Armed Forces Institutes increased as Marines began working for high school diplomas and credit for college courses.

► CIVIL AFFAIRS

MILITARY GOVERNMENT UNITS attached to the Division kept careful watch on Japanese civil affairs, investigating the status of homeless people, the work of Japanese public welfare agencies and neighborhood associations, and medical facilities. They checked the Japanese education program, public utilities, transportation, agriculture, fishing, shipping, coal mining, banking, price control, rationing and wage ceilings. Military government teams also screened the police and fire departments of Kyushu cities to find out whether they still employed former members of unfriendly or secret organizations. Those who had belonged to the Kempei Tai (secret police) were discharged. The Black Dragon Society and other fanatical groups were purged and ordered to disband.

Sasebo began to help itself by setting up a city reconstruction committee of leading citizens. The committee met to draw up plans for reconstruction, and it also supplied valuable information to military government officers and helped them locate and requisition native labor.

The Division was able to provide daily work for five thousand Japanese, but quotas, oddly enough, were not filled and it became apparent that there was a labor shortage on Kyushu. There were several reasons for the shortage. Many Japanese were in the fields harvesting the rice crop, and a few still thought that working for the Americans was dangerous. Forced labor legislation, which had been abolished with the end of the war, gave many an excuse for a prolonged holiday, but the major cause of the shortage was the ex-serviceman who had received his separation pay. With his separation pay of $120 the average Japanese soldier—if he had not too large a family—could loaf for almost two years if he wanted to.

There was a shortage of technicians as well as laborers. The Japanese demobilization had been so rapid and complete that there were few specialists left who knew how to handle Japanese explosives safely and to maintain utilities used by Marine units. About seven thousand Japanese sailors had been billeted near Sasebo at the time of the landing, but by October 1 only four thousand remained to perform naval police and administrative work. Army troops who had been in the area had been demobilized and were scattered throughout Japan.

Men and women who wanted to work were hired indiscriminately for cleaning and maintaining billets and for necessary construction, but women actually performed most of the menial tasks. The men liked to supervise in order to "save face." The Marines felt, however, that many Japanese were doing their work the hard way. One day a shaky, little bus limped over a soggy, rutted road and pulled up before a warehouse where Marines were billeted. A Japanese officer alighted, followed by ten soldiers. They lined up, dressed right, counted off, fell into two ranks and marched inside the building. Their job: to install twenty light bulbs in the Marine living quarters.

Another light-bulb incident was reported later by men of the 13th Marines stationed at Kawatana. Civilian electricians were installing lights in a barracks when one of their group asked Corporal George J. Byrnes to what branch of the American forces he belonged.

"The Marines," answered Byrnes.

Within two minutes the building was empty of Japanese.

Japanese inventories of war matériel were checked by Marines. A member of the occupation forces supervises the counting of enemy ammunition. Enemy arms and ammunition were dumped at sea.

In this same village artillerymen found an antiquated hospital which at one time had held 276 victims of the atomic bombing of Nagasaki, thirty-five miles to the south. Of these, 76 had died, 25 were still hospitalized and the rest had been discharged.

Marines who talked with the supervising doctor learned that the first patients brought in were "burned badly" and most of these died shortly after admission. Those who came in later seemed to fare much better.

One sallow-faced little girl, ten years old, was sitting on a bare bed. Almost all her hair was gone. Both parents and her brother had been killed in the blast.

"Her teeth are decaying and she has high blood pressure," the doctor said. "She will be completely bald soon."

The little girl smiled weakly when Marines gave her a bar of chocolate. Despite her suffering, she remembered her manners and inclined her head in a bow.

There were other atomic-bomb casualties in the Division area. Of 82 who were evacuated to Haiki, near Sasebo, 21 had died on the first day and 21 more on the second.

► NEW MISSIONS

THE 5TH DIVISION'S initial occupation mission had been to enforce the surrender terms throughout its zone. In October, however, Supreme Allied Headquarters in Tokyo had ordered that American troops on Kyushu perform two additional missions: disposition of enemy war material, and supervision of repatriation of Japanese coming home and Chinese and Koreans leaving Japan for their homes.

From October 20 to the end of November the Division's primary job, therefore, was to dispose of huge stores of military supplies and equipment. Kyushu was a gigantic arsenal of Japanese army, navy and air force matériel, and literally thousands of caches had been discovered in caves, factories, depots, and dumps.

Lieutenant Colonel Jack Tabor was appointed Division Disposition Officer to coordinate the work of disposition officers appointed on regimental and battalion level. Marines were careful not to destroy food, clothing, equipment, and machinery useful to the Japanese peacetime economy, but still thousands of tons of matériel were smashed, burned, blown up, or dumped at sea. Japanese laborers did most of this under American supervision.

Ammunition and explosives presented the greatest single disposition problem. Here the 5th Engineer Battalion and other specially trained Marines brought their highly developed skills into practice. Ordnance technicians who had taught hundreds of Division members the finer points of handling demolitions had not neglected training on disarming explosives. Men who had become experts in disarming on Iwo Jima now began wholesale destruction of enemy ammunition.

The largest ammunition dump in Japan had been at Saga, but there were plenty of others. One, for instance, inventoried twelve million pounds of picric-acid explosives. At Sasebo units of the 13th Marines had found themselves camped over a huge store of naval ammunition at the Sasebo aircraft factory. The stuff was everywhere! Cave-stored ammunition was partly decomposed, impossible to move, and dangerous to handle. It was exploded where it lay. Safer ammunition was moved by the trainload to the seacoast and dumped in the ocean. At Saga disposition teams set up the world's largest "popcorn popper" for destroying small-arms ammunition. They simply converted a concrete emplacement into a furnace and shoveled cartridges in by the truckload. As war material was destroyed it was checked off inventory lists (made by the Japanese and gone over by Marines) and disposition reports were made to higher headquarters.

► REPATRIATION

SUPERVISION OF REPATRIATION and demobilization of Japanese soldiers returning from China and Korea fell to the 13th Marines and the Fukoka occupation force. In the Sasebo area, where the 13th operated, American LSTs landed the incoming enemy soldiers and a few civilians at Urashira. At Fukuoka Japanese shipping was used exclusively because of the heavily mined waters surrounding the port.

One Japanese admiral was apprehensive about how these repatriates would react to the American occupation. He described them as "narrow, selfish, haughty men, who had on many occasions appropriated power to satisfy their own greed." These Asia-based soldiers had not tasted defeat and the admiral was afraid that their reaction to the surrender might take the form of violence.

Later in October the Japanese 58th Army and other scattered units began arriving at Urashira—a thousand men packed aboard each LST.¹ The rate of entry increased during November until Japanese were landing at the rate of three thousand a day. These troops were so well disciplined that earlier preparations for trouble were relaxed, and soon forty Marines under Major James Blackwell were handling thousands of home-bound Japanese.

Once ashore the Japanese were stripped, deloused, given shots, a medical examination and a general shakedown, and handed back their deloused clothing. Japanese police under Marine supervision put them through a rigid inspection to prevent weapons, loot, or excessive money from entering the country. After that they were marched three miles to Hario. Here Marines stood by Japanese officials who issued discharge papers and ordered the ex-soldiers to their homes.

Repatriates left this separation center with little comment and repeated refusals to admit that they had ever taken part in early Pacific conquests. One NCO declared that he was not sure whether he was happy to be back home or not—it was too early to tell—but he was definitely displeased at being dismissed from the army. That statement floored homesick Marines who overheard the interview.

Troops repatriated later from Saishuto, off the Korean coast, were surprised at the sudden end of the war. Many had not learned of Japan's loss of Okinawa. Older men were happy over the return of peace and their homecoming, but the younger ones made little comment.

By the end of November the 13th Marines and General Robinson's Leathernecks in Fukuoka had supervised the unloading, inspection, and demobilization of more than a hundred thousand incoming Japanese soldiers and civilians.

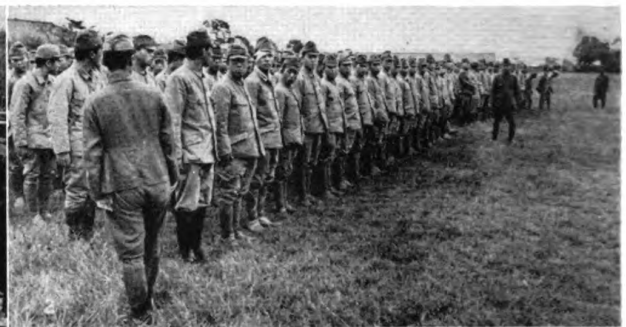

Ships bringing in these repatriates did not return to the Asiatic mainland empty. Thousands of Koreans and Chinese slave laborers wanted only to be returned to their homes. Fukuoka and Urashira again were embarkation points, and Japanese police supervised by Marines processed the repatriates.

Men, women, and children shivered through outdoor assembly lines as they were inspected, deloused and given physical examinations before being packed aboard Japanese ships and American LSTs. During October and November the 13th Marines and the Fukuoka occupation force shipped over fifty thousand Chinese and Koreans back to Asia.

► SLEUTHING

Repatriation of Japanese soldiers from China and Korea became another major mission of the 5th Division. (1) Enemy troops prepare to land at Urashira, near Sasebo. (2) Well disciplined troops, still under their own officers, soon were arriving at the rate of three thousand daily.

Division headquarters with a strange request.

"When the atomic bomb was dropped over Nagasaki," he told the G-2, "two metal cylinders containing instruments to measure the force of the blast and other data were parachuted down at the same time. These cylinders, we have reason to believe, are in the hands of the Japanese. Your job," he added, "is to find them—and in a hurry!"

Japanese language officers immediately began to question former enemy personnel who might furnish a clue to the recovery of these instruments. Finally Lieutenant Joseph O. Zurhellen extracted from a Japanese admiral the admission that the cylinders had been found by the enemy, but only after he had questioned the admiral for twenty-four solid hours. Within forty-eight hours one cylinder had been recovered. Ten days later the second was found in a physics laboratory in Fukuoka. Japanese experts had field-stripped it and were on the verge of knowing exactly what had fallen into their hands.

As the occupation went on, civilians around Sasebo, although perfectly friendly, had become bolder and less subservient. They no longer made way for vehicles, which increased the traffic problem, and a few were guilty of minor violations of the law and noncooperation. Fifty-two Japanese soldiers were jailed for arrogance, and several civilians, including one woman, who were caught with Marine clothing and rations, were turned over to civilian police who promptly beat them severely.

The military government and the Division G-2 section suspected that large supplies of naval stores had been issued to civilians and government agencies by the Japanese navy after the surrender. After one high-ranking Japanese naval officer sweated out a week of solitary confinement he told the story. A special civilian agency run by demobilized naval officers had been set up and had received about half of the gasoline, clothing, food and other small stores of the Japanese navy.

Profiteers had netted millions of yen selling these items to civilians. Crafty intelligence work by the Division thwarted this huge black market and resulted in the arrest of numerous Japanese.

Soon, however, a food shortage developed, caused by a steep rise in prices which had taken place since the occupation. Government buyers offered farmers 30 yen for rice; the black market gave 500 yen. Cigarettes leaped from 60 sen to 10 yen a pack. To have a shirt laundered before the occupation cost 25 sen—about one and a half cents. Now it was 2 yen—about 13 cents.

In mid-November the Division received startling reports of rice selling at eighty times the fixed government price and of impending starvation of the poor. These came from prominent Sasebo residents who, when they were questioned about the black market (which they referred to as "the dark market") also involved local police and the Japanese Navy. Some said the illicit buying was necessary for survival at a time when the average adult was receiving 1,040 calories a day. Unlawful purchases in the country by merchants who resold food in the city was the alleged cause of the skyrocketing prices. One citizen explained that when the Navy was demobilized the "uncultured, uneducated" police lost face completely with the people.

Some sources linked control of black-market rings to military underground groups. Others claimed that demobilized officers and NCOs who received huge bonus payments were the cause of the trouble.

Many of these accusations appeared to be true. Only forty-seven per cent of the rice crop had been reported to the authorities, the rest apparently having been sold on the black market. One result of this was that school children in some areas did not have lunches and began to show signs of want and malnutrition.

On November 15, 5th Division search parties struck at forty-one shrines, temples, and school buildings in the Sasebo area, which up until then had been protected from search and trespassing by "safeguard" signs. Marines sought secret caches of weapons, documents or military matériel. Eleven teams reported they had found some contraband. Searches of Saga and Kurume schools yielded a few weapons and wooden rifles and some shrines contained swords. Nothing of importance turned up, however.

Japan is quickly stripped of its war potential as Marines supervise destruction of weapons, explosives and equipment not usable by the civilian population. (1) Burning Japanese Army equipment. (2) Aircraft engines and naval 20mm AA guns are destroyed by the 13th Marines. (3) A cutting torch renders enemy artillery pieces harmless. (4) Japanese, with Marines looking on, load an LSM with rifles and machine guns for dumping at sea.

End of a Mission

AFTER TWO MONTHS of occupation the 5th Division could measure statistically some of the results of its enforcement of surrender terms. The enemy armed forces had been demobilized, war matériel was ninety per cent razed, ammunition and explosives twenty per cent destroyed, and turnover to the Japanese Home Ministry of materials and equipment usable by the Japanese in peacetime eighty per cent complete.

The 13th Marines alone had scuttled at sea or otherwise destroyed about 188,000 rounds of artillery and mortar ammunition; 25,000 aerial bombs; 400 tons of aircraft parts; 30 tons of signal equipment; 1,800 machine guns; 161 miscellaneous warmaking machines; 270 torpedoes; 650 tons of torpedo parts; 4,500 mines and depth charges; 83 large guns; and tons of other equipment.

The 13th's brother regiments and the separate battalions built up similar records. All units continued their inventory of remaining matériel to assist units which would replace them.

Changes in civilian life also had come to Japan. Secret societies and "thought police" had been rooted out and suppressed. Reconstruction of cities and towns had been hastened by the liberal use of American engineering equipment. Factories had reconverted to peacetime production—a naval boiler plant was producing farm machinery; a TNT factory began making dyes; a machine-gun plant now turned out irrigation pumps and printing presses; arsenals were converted into kitchen utensil factories; aircraft factories were taken over by manufacturers of bicycles, prefabricated houses, and bricks. New agricultural land—once restricted military zones—was sprouting crops. Farmers began to plant rice on airfields.

The rank and file of the people had not yet begun to appreciate or even to realize the widespread changes in their form of government and their new civil liberties. For the moment their problem was to exist. In time, however, the people could make their democracy work. Now it was enough that the military government officers and the occupation forces should demonstrate the American ideal of justice tempered with mercy. The 5th Division's demonstration of this in their conduct was, perhaps, their greatest contribution to the success of the occupation.

► FAREWELL TO JAPAN

EARLY IN OCTOBER American mop-up forces in the South Pacific had become critically short of troops to supervise the repatriation of Japanese from conquered and by-passed islands. Such an emergency arose at Peleliu and the 26th Marines were recalled from occupation duty to do the job. On October 19, Colonel Graham's regiment was relieved by units of the 32d Infantry Division. The 2d Battalion was disbanded and the remainder of CT 26 left Japan for the South Pacific.

"Home—when do we go there?" was the main topic of conversation among the remaining Marines in the Division. After two months of occupation duty, it seemed that a new back-to-the-States rumor started every hour. To illustrate the trend of the times, one unit's news bulletin topped its masthead with: "If You Haven't Heard the Latest Rumor By 1730 Start Your Own."

Demobilization of high-point Marines had been going on, of course, all during the occupation. In October and November 265 officers and 2,939 men were returned to the United States.

As the "old men"—Marines who had been fighting the war in the Pacific long enough to pile up 90 to 140 points—arrived at the docks, they stood in small groups waiting for LSMs to take them to their transports. Japanese rifles or swords, given to each Marine as a war trophy, poked out of sea bags stacked nearby.

A colonel drove down to the dock to say goodbye to a private first class who had been his jeep driver. A first sergeant stood in the middle of a group, wishing his "ex-Leathernecks" good luck. A captain on his way home—a wide grin on his face—talked to a group of his men. The Division band marched up and played music the homeward-bound Marines would be hearing State-side—swing numbers and the inevitable "California Here I Come."

This transfer of personnel for separation, however pleasant for the men being discharged, greatly handicapped the remaining forces. It stripped units of many of their best and most experienced officers and NCOs and caused a constant reassignment of duties.

Beginning on November 23, V Amphibious Corps began to relieve the 5th of its areas of responsibility and to assign them to the 2d Marine Division and the 32d Infantry Division. It arranged for the disbandment of the Fukuoka Base Command and assigned its missions to the Army. High-point men of the 5th Division remained with their units while low-pointers—those who were not going home immediately—were assigned to the 2d Division and to Corps troops.

Units spread across Kyushu soon were pulled back to Sasebo and began to turn over much of their equipment to the 2d Division and 8th Service Regiment.

On December 5, the transport Pondera carrying homeward bound 5th Division Marines sailed from Sasebo. Two days later five other troopships put to sea.

On December 8 the 2d Division assumed control of the entire Division zone and occupation duty ended for the "Spearhead" troops.

As the last of the Division prepared to embark, Headquarters received the following commendation from Lieutenant General Roy S. Geiger:

"On the occasion of the prospective separation of the 5th Marine Division from the Fleet Marine Force, Pacific, the Commanding General desires to take this opportunity to extend to the officers and men of the division a 'well done' for its part in the prosecution of the war against Japan.

"In the Iwo Jima operation, and in the occupation of the Japanese homeland, the 5th Marine Division, by its execution of assigned missions, exhibited beyond any doubt that its success was derived from a well-trained, and well-led professional team.

"The officers and men of the 5th Marine Division may take pride in the knowledge that they have played an important role in ultimately defeating the enemy.

"The performance of the 5th Marine Division has been in keeping with the highest tradition of the U.S. Marine Corps and has added laurels to its history."

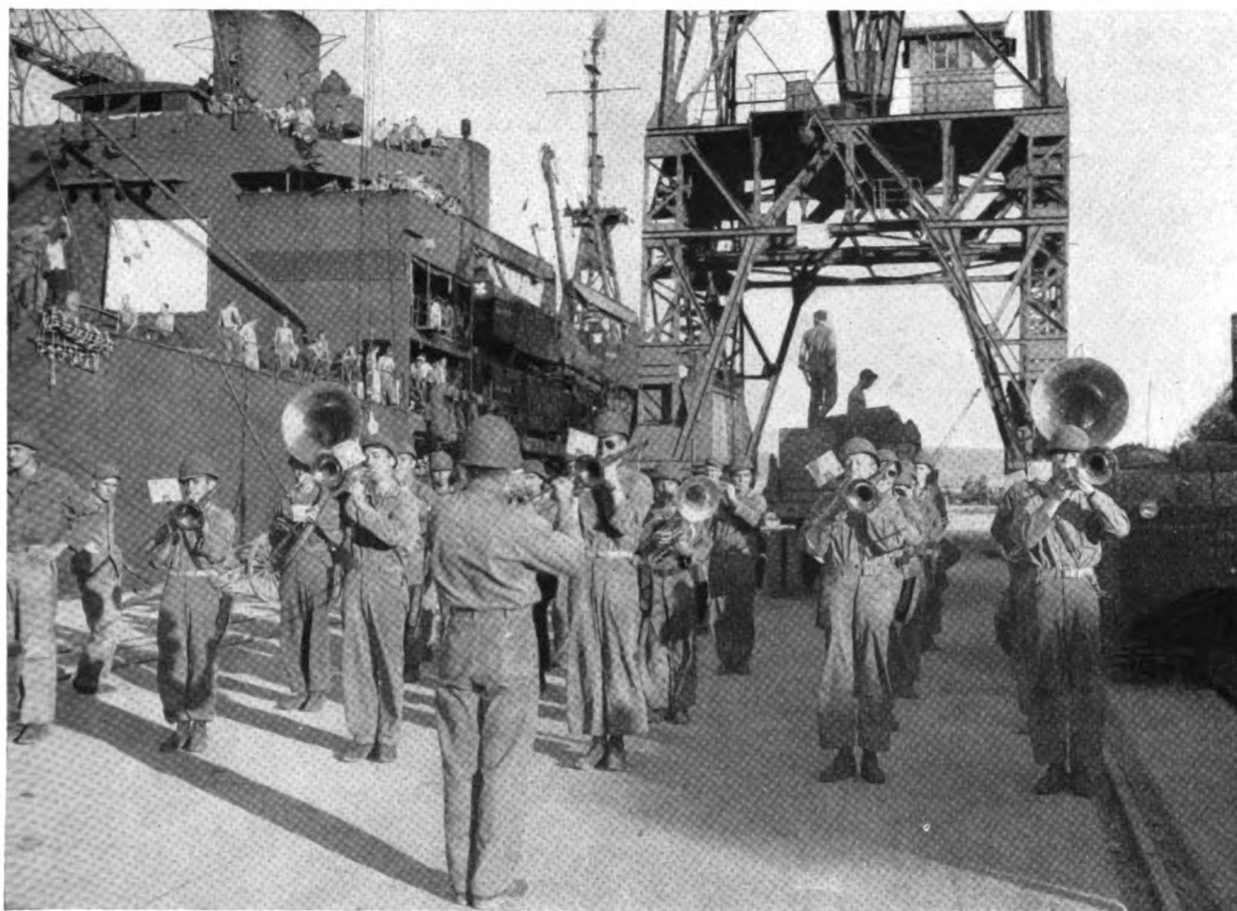

On December 18 General Bourke was detached and General Robinson assumed command. That day the command post closed at Marine Camp, Ainoura, and opened aboard the transport Leon.

Every day, between December 20 and the end of 1945, transports carrying 5th Division troops from Japan docked at San Diego. Division Headquarters arrived on Christmas Day. Equipment went to Camp Elliott and only necessary records accompanied Marines to Camp Pendleton. The 28th Marines (as they had done two years before) went to billets in Tent Camp No. 1.

As the Division units reported to the Marine Training and Replacement Command, San Diego Area, they received instructions for the gradual transfer of men for separation and reassignment. During January 1946, more than 500 officers and 11,000 men were relieved from active duty and discharged; 93 officers and 529 men were transferred to the other units.

Throughout the entire pre-discharge period, Marines received instruction which prepared them for return to school or to civilian employment, with special emphasis on veterans' benefits.

Between January 5 and 10, 1946, the 13th and the 27th Marines were disbanded. On January 12, General Robinson, the Division Commander, was detached and Colonel Liversedge took command of the remaining units.

The Division rear echelon arrived from Hawaii on January 15 and the next day eight LSTs carrying the 5th's last overseas personnel reached San Diego. Late in January the 28th Marines were disbanded along with the Pioneers, Engineers, and service elements, and on February 5, 1946, Headquarters Battalion was disbanded and the 5th Marine Division passed into history.

Exactly one year after the Division had landed on Iwo Jima, Headquarters and the 3d Battalion, 26th Marines arrived at San Diego from Peleliu. Disbandment came quickly for these units. The 1st Battalion completed its mission on Peleliu in March and moved north to Guam where it, too, died an honorable death.

The 5th Marine Division is no more than a memory, but it is a memory that its men will carry with them all their lives. It was born of the terrible necessity of war, but it fought as few divisions were called upon to fight and the courage of its men became a legend in its own lifetime.

Effect of Casualties

FOLLOWING THE IWO JIMA operation the 5th Marine Division made a study of its casualty reports to indicate the way in which casualties affected specific companies and battalions as well as the entire Division. Information contained in this appendix is based on that study.¹

The 5th Marine Division, reinforced, summarized its battle casualties from February 17 to March 26, 1945, inclusive, as follows:

	Present strength	Casualties	Casualties per cent
Organic units	17,067	7,180	42.0
Attached units	3,529	190	5.3
Replacement drafts	2,545	1,400	55.0
TOTALS	23,141	8,770	37.8

The cumulative figure for D plus 35 as adjusted June 1, 1945, by changes of status of missing in action and wounded in action was as follows:

	Officers	Enlisted
Killed in action and died of wounds	104	2,378
Wounded in action	250	5,968
TOTALS	356	8,363

Approximately 1,275 officers and enlisted men were evacuated sick from their units; approximately 1,075 returned to duty in the target area. Of those permanently evacuated about 125 were classified as combat fatigue (exhaustion) and psycho-neurosis cases; the remainder were for severe gastric and respiratory disorders.

Two hundred fifty eight officers and enlisted men received a second wound; nine received a third wound.

Fifty-five of these died as a result of the second or third wound.

Twenty-six officers and enlisted men received injuries, four of whom died, not the direct result of enemy action.

► 2d BATTALION, 26th MARINES

IN ORDER TO SHOW the effect of these casualties on a specific infantry battalion, details are given in regard to the 2d Battalion, 26th Marines.

BLT 2/26 landed with 37 officers and 917 enlisted. Of these, 26 officers and 728 enlisted were battle casualties and 1 officer and 93 enlisted were evacuated from the island due to sickness. This left 10 officers and 96 enlisted who were not battle casualties nor sick. Four officers and 68 enlisted who had been wounded were returned to duty during the operation.

During the operation the battalion received 14 officers and 251 enlisted from replacement drafts and by intra-regimental transfers. Of these, 10 officers and 174 enlisted were battle casualties and 31 were evacuated due to sickness.

The total battle casualties (not including sick) sustained by this unit was 36 officers and 902 enlisted. Computed on the basis of the initial landing strength of 37 officers and 917 enlisted, the percentage of casualties is 95.0 in officers and 98.0 in enlisted.

BLT 2/26 landed on Beach Red 2 at about 1630 on D-day, February 19, 1945. Until the early morning of February 22, the battalion occupied positions on the west side of the island in rear of the front lines providing depth and beach security. From February 22 until February 27 the battalion attacked in the center of the Division's zone of action. On March 2 the battalion was again committed to action and participated in some of the hottest fighting, including the attack on Hill 362C. The battalion was relieved on March 6 but was again committed from March 9 until March 16 in the rugged northwest end of the island. Thus, in the first twenty-five days of the operation, the battalion spent seventeen days and nights in the front lines.

The battalion commander, Lieutenant Colonel Joseph P. Sayers, having refused to remain aboard the transport although limping with a painful sprained knee, was hit by shrapnel in the arm and side on the morning of February 23 and was forced to turn over command of BLT 2/26 to Major Amedeo Rea, who commanded the unit for the remainder of the operation with heroic, inspired leadership.

Company E came out of the line on February 27 under the command of the first sergeant, all officers having become casualties. On the morning of March 3 the most costly and successful attack of the Division during the operation was launched against Hill 362C. Company F made a sustained drive of six hundred yards, spearheading the attack of the battalion. In the attack the battalion suffered 152 casualties and the commands of Companies D and E were changed because of casualties.

Of the officers who were original members of this battalion, 27 became casualties. Of these, 3 were killed in action, 3 died of wounds, 1 was sick and evacuated, and the remaining 20 were wounded in action.

In the Headquarters Company, when Lieutenant Colonel J. P. Sayers was wounded on February 23, 1945, Major Amedeo Rea, the executive officer, took command of the battalion, and Captain Thomas M. Fields became the battalion executive officer, standing detached from Company D as company commander. Of the 14 officers present in Headquarters Company, 7 were casualties, including Captain Richard T. Welihan, the Headquarters Company commanding officer, who was wounded by shrapnel in the chest on March 6, 1945.

In Company D, after Captain Fields was detached, there were 100 per cent officer casualties, Company E had 100 per cent officer casualties, and in Company F there were 100 per cent officer casualties with the exception of Captain Frank C. Caldwell, who was treated on the spot for minor wounds and did not relinquish command.
